NOTES OF THE WEEK.

GOOD WISHES for the New Year are not idle words. They have come to us from many friends, and we most cordially reciprocate them all. It has been a great encouragement to hear that THE INQUIRER has been found helpful during the past year, not only among the churches it endeavours specially to serve, but by other friends, and some in lonely places, where it is a peculiar pleasure to be a welcome messenger. It would be too much to expect that anyone should be completely satisfied, and certainly the Editor is not; but there is reason to take courage, and to press on.

ONE very pleasant New Year's gift has been the renewal of the special subscriptions for copies to be sent to Free Libraries. The cost of those which have been hitherto sent has been at once covered for the New Year; but if other friends are well disposed towards THE INQUIRER and the public in this particular way, there is, of course, abundant scope for more such gifts. And may we add a word to all who have the interest of our paper at heart. The best encouragement is to find that there is a growing demand for copies. There are many and various pennyworths hidden in the pages of this penny paper, and we are very far from thinking that every one who would like some of them actually buys the paper. What we ask of our friends is that they should each one persuade some other ones of what they really want. We shall be the better in every way, and we dare to believe that our friends will be the better, if they will all regularly take and read their own special part of THE INQUIRER.

A MEETING of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, adjourned from the annual meeting at Dover, is to be held on Tuesday afternoon at Essex Hall to consider the suggested By-laws in connection with the Advisory Committee, which the Assembly voted it was desirable to appoint. The Committee is of opinion that the Advisory Committee should consist of five members, the President of the Assembly, together with two ministers and two laymen. When the matter of the By-laws is settled, it will be proposed, on behalf of the Committee, that the following gentlemen be appointed to serve as the Advisory Committee until the next meeting of the Assembly:—The President (Mr. George W. Chitty), Rev. W. Copeland-Bowie, Rev. James Harwood, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold and Dr. W. Blake Odgers. It is important that there should be a thoroughly representative meeting of ministers and delegates to deal effectually with this matter.

THE Special Services Committee have made arrangements with the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A. to preach at the following places on the dates named:—

Jan. 8th	Cardiff.
" 9th (Monday)	Pontypridd.
" 15th	Portsmouth.
" 22nd	Todmorden.
Feb. 5th	Birmingham, Church of the Messiah.
" 12th	Northampton.
" 19th	Bristol.
Mar. 5th	Stourbridge.
" 12th	Huddersfield.
" 13th (Monday)	Scarborough.
" 19th	Middlesborough.
" 26th	Bournemouth.
Apr. 2nd	Brixton, London.
" 9th (Morning)	Coventry.
" 9th (Evening)	Birmingham, New Hall Hill.

Our readers will be interested to learn that the sermon on "Christianity and Social Problems" which Mr. Brooke recently preached at Bermondsey, has been printed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as one of the new series of "Sermons for the Times."

In a recent elaborate letter to his clergy on "The Present Distress," the Archbishop of York deals with the various points of controversy now dividing Church people. His advice is practical and conciliatory, with a hopeful outlook for the future. One paragraph of the letter especially may be of service to others besides his clergy:—

"If there is one thing which above all others we ought to keep before us as our object of desire at the present day, it is the deepening and strengthening of the devotional life of our people. In an intellectual age they are continually meeting with intellectual instruction, in books and in sermons, and in many other ways. But there is comparatively little done for the deeper needs of their being; and yet, just in proportion as these are supplied, we may reckon upon that steadfastness of character and seriousness of life which would fit them to occupy their allotted place, not only in the Church of Christ as His worshipping servants, but also as regards their relations to their fellow-men and their duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call them. I may add that in this spiritual growth and progress we shall find the best hope of deliverance from the contentions and controversies which are so apt to arise when religion has been presented to our people, more from its intellectual or doctrinal or ceremonial side, than in its spiritual power to elevate and to sanctify their spiritual life. In proportion as spiritual life increases in any branch of the Church, the voice of discord is likely to die down into silence."

THE idea of a Twentieth Century Fund is contagious. Mr. Perks's Million Guinea Fund for the Wesleyans kindled the fire. Then came Dr. Guinness Rogers's appeal for half-a-million for the Congregational churches, and now the General Purposes Committee of the Baptist Union are recommending that a quarter-of-a-million pounds shall be raised from half-a-million Baptists, for a similar fund. As there are more than a million Baptists in the country it is hoped that this may be accomplished. It is proposed to use the fund for the evangelisation of the country and church extension, the Annuity Fund, the augmentation of the stipends of poor ministers, and the erection of a Baptist Church House.

THE long-expected "Evangelical Free Church Catechism" has come as a New Year's gift. Two years ago Dr. J. Oswald Dykes, Principal of the Presbyterian College, Cambridge, was appointed by the National Council to prepare a first draft; this has been subjected to the most careful revision by a representative committee, of which the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes was chairman. Congregationalists were represented on the committee by the Revs. Dr. Berry, Dr. Mackennal, Dr. Guinness Rogers, Dr. Barrett, and Mr. J. Vernon Bartlet, of Mansfield College, Oxford. The Wesleyan members, in addition to the chairman, included Dr. J. Agar Beet. The Baptists were the Revs. Dr. Clifford, Dr. T. V. Tymms, and G. P. Gould; the Presbyterians Dr. Dykes and Dr. J. Monro Gibson. The Methodist New Connexion the Bible Christians, and the United Methodist Free Church were also represented.

WE shall examine the new Catechism with the utmost interest, and hope to give some further account of it next week. Meanwhile we are glad to reproduce for our readers the following passage from a leading article in the Daily Chronicle of January 5:—

"The movement in England for the federation of Free Churches has proved to be a response to a general desire for some concrete unity. We do not mean uniformity, we mean such unity as, e.g., exists politically in the United States, where New York and California have each their own separate autonomy, while yet linked together in a common bond of duty and affection. So the Free Church Federation links together the orthodox denominations who stand by Protestant principles in a common union expressed in terms of a common faith. Doubtless the Romeward or Catholic tendencies in the Church of England, have led up to this demonstration, which is, in spite of the tendency to rather high sacramental doctrine, anti-sacerdotal in its general conception of the Christian faith. The "dissidence of Dissent" is no longer to be levelled as a reproach against English Nonconformity, which, now, except in so far as the Quakers and the Unitarians are concerned, will be able to show a creed—that is to say, a statement of what are understood to be fundamental beliefs—to the world. How far this statement will be accepted by the whole of the Free Churches we do not know. In the Baptist and Congregationalist bodies, the principle of the independence of each Church holds good, and no outside power can force the new Catechism on such an autonomous body. If the recent criticism of some of the Congregationalist Churches, as holding practically Unitarian views, be correct, we should imagine that some of the formulas contained in the Catechism will be by no means acceptable to such communities. For the Catechism is strictly Evangelical. Here and there, as in the definition of baptism (as Mr. Hughes admits), compromise was necessary, but in the main there is little evidence that the controversies of our time have fundamentally unsettled the creed of the Nonconformist Churches."

DR. FAIRBAIRN'S lectures under the Haskell Trust have been received with the utmost interest in Calcutta, Overtown Hall having been filled to its utmost capacity with over a thousand hearers. Unity and the Minister, one of the organs of the Brahma Somaj, speaks enthusiastically of the eloquence, the philosophical depth, and the simplicity of style of the lectures, and is grateful for the manner in which Dr. Fairbairn grapples with the questions of physical and moral evil, the nature of God and man, and the end of human life—questions which perplex the educated people of India as they did the Greeks of old. The World and the New Dispensation also welcomes the lectures, and appeals to Dr. Fairbairn to study the teaching of Chunder Sen concerning Christ and the true nature of Christianity.

On New Year's Eve the Church Gazette published an Omnibus article by "Symbol," in which the first paragraph read as follows:—

With our Nonconformist friends, January 1 is the day of the year par excellence. They prepare for it by a watch-night, and, although in a general way it is not a Sabbath, when it happens to fall on a Sunday you may be sure the occasion is improved. Perhaps it may be well that once in a year they hallow an occasion. If only the good people would extend their Ritualism just so far as to reverence Good Friday!

The ill-mannered impertinence of this paragraph is what we are accustomed to in a certain class of churchmen, but we did not expect to meet with it in the Church Gazette. The Watchnight Service we had always understood, both in the Church of England and among Nonconformists, to be a preparation not for a special day, but for a New Year. And for our own part we hold both Christmas Day and Good Friday to have sacred associations most fitly commemorated by special religious services.

MR. A. E. FLETCHER gives an interesting account in the New Age of his recent lecturing tour in the Netherlands. He met with a warm response to his lectures on "Ruskin" and "The Victorian Poets." Referring to the condition of religious thought in Holland, Mr. Fletcher says:—

The Dutch are a magnificent people, with a record for the championship of civil and religious freedom of which any nation might be proud. Even to-day there is greater religious freedom and less superstition in the Netherlands than in any other country. I made some of their theologians laugh when I spoke to them of our recently-formed Union of the Free Churches, a union which excluded the freest of them all—namely, the Unitarian. They could not understand what claim any union of Churches had to freedom which excluded from their councils men like James Martineau and Stopford Brooke. "Why, here," said a learned professor to me at Groningen, "we impose no test whatever, even upon our theological teachers, and the churches themselves will often accept a Unitarian in preference to an orthodox Calvinist." They rightly regard religion as a question of conduct rather than of opinion. As a matter of fact, the Tolstoyans and the Unitarians are increasing in numbers and influence in the Netherlands, as also are the Roman Catholics. The concurrent increase of these two sections of the Christian Church is quite natural. The Reformation threw over the infallibility of the Pope in favour of the infallibility of the Bible, and now that the Bible, owing largely to the researches of Dutch scholars, has been proved to be not infallible, the orthodox Nonconformists are diminishing in numbers, while there is a reversion to Rome on the one hand, and a still larger accession to religious liberalism on the other.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON, in his annual New Year's Address to the Positivist Society, referred to the proposed International Conference.

A voice had been lifted up among the nations denouncing the evil of war, and loudly proclaiming that civilisation must sink under the burden unless the weight of armaments could be reduced. And this bitter cry had been raised by the most powerful monarch in the world, and one possessing the largest army. The greatest lord of a military empire was proclaiming a homily of peace, and all this centred around the militarism, imperial expansion, and national aggrandisement, which Positivists for thirty years had deplored as the real bane of our time. The appeal of the Great White Tsar to the nations of the West to meet and consider the advancing tide of militarism was a great and important event in itself. The fact that such an appeal had been made and had been made by the autocrat of a nation of such enormous power must indirectly have far-reaching effects. It was clear that the Tsar himself was in grim earnest, that he meant to attempt something on his own account, and that his able Ministers would find something practicable and arguable to lay before the Conference and to prevent a fiasco.

In a later passage of the address, Mr. Harrison said of the Church of Rome that it

Was not now even Popery, because it was not inspired by the wise, humane, and generous Holy Father of the Vatican; but was headed by the black Pope, the secret and unscrupulous spirit of the Jesuits, whose aims had nothing to do with morality or civilisation, but were meant to keep up clerical institutions, with all their privileges, immunities, and monopolies.

ONE of our ministers of wide experience in mission work in a great city has recently issued a circular to secretaries of musical and dramatic societies, embodying certain rules and suggestions for the acceptance of those who might be willing to help at meetings in connection with the mission. The following suggestions may be found useful elsewhere:—

(4.) The programme is to be kept free, in word and action, from what is generally termed coarseness. We want humour without vulgarity, pathos that never descends into bathos, and wit with a touch of wisdom in it. We want an entertainment to which a working-man, of the "Village Blacksmith" type, can bring his wife and daughters and merry laughing boys, and feel all the better and brighter for it himself, and also feel that his children have received no harm. The style of programme which we have found from experience to be the most popular is that which is generally divided into two distinct parts:—A good miscellaneous first part, consisting of songs, duets, trios, recitations, and instrumental pieces; followed by a second part consisting of a short dramatic sketch—humorous, but with a little sense in it to give it a backbone of probability.

(5.) We are compelled to exclude stumps, speeches and dancing from our programmes.

(6.) Smoking is not allowed in any part of the building.

(7.) The furniture in the classrooms and on the platform is to be used with care—in what is called a "legitimate manner."

DR. ORELLO CONE, who is known in this country as the author of several interesting books on New Testament theology, and who is the general editor of the series of "International Handbooks to the Bible," which is in course of issue, says that the volume in that series dealing with the greater Pauline Epistles, by Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, is in the press. Dr. Cone himself, after a lengthened residence in Germany, has just become pastor of the Unitarian Church, Lawrence, Kansas.

THE first action brought by the City of Brussels against the Belgian State and Pastor Hocart with regard to the legal recognition of the Liberal Protestant Church, was finally decided on Thursday, 29th ult., by the Court of Cassation against the City of Brussels. It still remains to be seen whether the City of Brussels will persevere in its second action against Pastor Hocart personally. After the pronouncement of the Highest Court on one point, and the very energetic language of the Procureur général (public prosecutor) in favour of the legality of the recognition of the Church by the State, this new effort of the town to re-open the question seems hardly likely to meet with success.

NEW YEAR'S DAWN.

A SHROUD of snow enwrapped the old dead year,
As through the lonely night
I watched the solemn hills loom cold and drear,
And waited for the light.

How long delayed its radiant coming seemed!

At last a pallid hue
Eastwards turned rosy red, then golden gleamed,
And bright and brighter grew.

Then when a ray of pure translucent light
Proclaimed the perfect dawn,
The shroud became a robe of glistening white
Meet for the year new-born;

And swiftly from the heav'n of gold and flame
Beyond the distant hill,
A young hope like a blessed angel came,
And walks beside me still.

THEODORA MILLS.

REVERENTIAL FEAR.

Where lies the Land to which yon ship must go?

Fresh as a lark mounting at break of day,
Festively she puts forth in trim array;
Is she for tropic suns, or polar snow?

... doubt, and something dark,
Of the old Sea some reverential fear,
Is with me at thy farewell, joyous Bark!

We might without fancifulness speak somewhat in this way as we watch the beginning of a year. Like a ship that parts from its moorings and stands out to sea, the new year upon which we enter starts upon its voyage of the months and days. "Festively she puts forth," in a time of holiday and merriment, when we are wishing one another every happy wish, and the spirit of good-fellowship finds a voice on every side. And in the midst of it there comes the question, Where lies the land to which this ship of the year must go? To what port is it bound? What kind of a voyage is in store—will there be more of sunshine and fair weather, or more of darkness and storm? When the months are done in what haven will it lie?

These are the speculations which come into our minds in the early moments of the year, whether we are thinking of the general life of the world, or of our own country, or of our own personal lives. And there may well be with us, as with the poet when he watched the ship put forth, "of the old Sea some reverential fear," the old sea of Human Life in the world. For the same mystery hangs over our life as over the grey sea. Our life has its shallows and its depths, its tides and currents, its rocks and sandy shoals; it is visited by winds and the sudden violence of storms, and it knows the face of the sun, and it has its happy islands.

This mood of fear is a very proper mood in which to set out, but we must be sure what kind of fear it is. We are not to indulge in nervous apprehension, and conjure up all manner of dangers and misfortunes, pains and distresses, lying in wait for us in the months to come. We are not to betake ourselves to dismal prophecy, as though the sea of life were a place of shipwrecks and nothing more. This is not reverential fear. The child that cries in the dark, which he fills with creatures of his fancy, is in fear, but it is not a reverential fear. He has no reverence for the dark, if he had he would not cry.

When we look over a ship's side into the deep translucent waters, what makes us feel serious and ties our tongue as we realise all the uncounted fathoms over which we travel so lightly? Is it merely the possibility of personal danger, the fear that we may be drowned? It is something vastly more. It is the sense of the illimitable, of unknown unimaginable force, the feeling that we are in presence of something that has us in its power, beside which we seem to be nothing. It is that sense of infinite and sacred mystery which made the sea-peoples of old find a whole race of divinities in "the light and sound and darkness of the sea."

And it is not the thought of personal risks and dangers, of sickness, of adverse fortune, that fills us with kindred awe as we contemplate life. These things may make us fretful, they cannot make us worshippers. What gives the years their sacredness is the experience of the moral life, the sense of an Infinite Will set over against our finite will, whose whole direction and object are not in our power to know, but into reconciliation with which we must come if we would have security and peace. The vastness of its moral issues broods over the old sea of human life and summons us to a reverential fear.

AMBROSE BENNETT.

THE JOY OF PROGRESS.

WHAT is the meaning of that strange deep thrill of joy which sometimes comes with the thought of the onward sweep of Time? To feel the years advancing upon us and the ages growing vaster behind us, is to be moved as if one caught the strain of some great sphere music, the melody of stars chanting the thoughts of God. I suppose it is the idea of progress—the faith in a large unfolding purpose that brings to the heart this joy.

We have heard men deplore the passing of the years, as if it were sad to have lived through them, or grievous to be growing old. But life is not loss, and the steady advance of Time is not the destruction of real treasure or a lessening of things that make it good to be. We live and love and learn, gathering wealth thus as the days dawn and die. So is it, doubtless, with the larger world. The "flight of Time" is surely an unhappy figure of speech; the onward sweep of creative thought is what we really know, and should rejoice in. Man may count himself little and of poor significance in this vast order of things. "Our noisy years" may seem but "moments in the being of the eternal silence." Yet to be aware of the silence is something; to be dimly conscious of an inner, secret purpose working there, to muse on that, and then to rise up and take some rational part in its unfolding—this is to be made one with the great Heart of all, and to have some right to say, in reverent gladness, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work."

Eons of time were needed to attain unto Man on this little earth-planet. "Without haste, and without rest" those æons passed. And in Man the end or goal of complex, organic life, on its material side, would seem to have been reached.

For centuries there has been no advance on the physical type. None seems possible. The onward movement now is spiritual—consciously and individually purposive. The human mind turns to gaze on that by which Man has come to be, and beholds there, though only as "in a mirror" the ideal of creation itself. Henceforth he is a child of the highest and may become a "fellow-worker with God." Every advance in the knowledge of Nature, in moral sensitiveness and strenuousness, in spiritual insight and aspiration, is a self-determined effort of the soul to share in the vast progressive movement of Time.

Well and wisely, then, may Man rejoice with the advancing centuries and hear at least some faint refrain of that old melody which Pythagoras heard when he talked of the "music of the spheres."

For life shall on and upward go:

Th' eternal step of progress beats

To that great anthem calm and slow,

Which God repeats.

It would aid us much in the small details of life, in the plain, prosaic facts of duty, to carry in our hearts this sense of calm majestic purpose moving through all. To step out into the first days of another year, thrilled with a sense of joy that the onward sweep of Time is but the advance of some great good, might prove better than the making of many resolutions or the brooding over bygone failures and mistakes. We are sad because of the little we have done or can do; we are oppressed with the greatness of what is needing to be done. "Is it worth tilling, this tiny plot of mine, in so vast a field, where the weeds of evil flourish in their pride? So slow the good advances, so few are its prophets, so many are its foes!" But let me think of the ages that have been, the ages that shall be, and the steady quiet advance of knowledge and freedom and justice and love. Progress—we must possess our minds with the reality and sureness of that. We must rally and recover ourselves with the remembrance of what those who lived before us wrought and suffered, thought and spoke, the fruit of which we reap and possess to-day. Not by miracles of supernatural power; not by startling events or sudden revelations; but by patient thinking and plodding toil and noble sacrifice, the knowledge and liberty and peace we inherit now have been won. Treasures of truth and beauty and good, which are the legacy of almost every child—the common things of science and art and a free religious faith—were gained for us in other days by arduous human effort. Discoveries and inventions, ideals and hopes, now accessible to all who care—or at least the most—were once rare, and out of reach to all but the few; earlier still, were known to none, were as yet undreamed. Our fathers won them for us, helping forward thus the purpose of creative power.

Thoughts that great hearts once broke for, we

Breathe cheaply in the common air;

The dust we trample heedlessly

Throbbed once in saints and heroes rare,

Who perished, opening for their race

New pathways to the common place.

Progress—we may rest and rejoice in that; slow it is, or seems, because the purpose is so vast, or because we see but a little way; yet patient, persistent, sure. And the great persuasive fact is that we, to-day, have our part therein—our share to contribute and contrive in the calm unfolding purpose of beauty and of good. And this little work of ours, seen as a real and living part of the infinite process of God, is what can make us nobly and serenely glad; for, indeed, it is no longer little when wrought as in the light of the Eternal and by the inspiration of some large and limitless hope. W. J. JUPP.

"THALATTA."

The Cry of the Ten Thousand.

I stand upon the summit of my years.
Behind, the toil, the camp, the march, the strife,
The wandering and the desert; vast, afar,
Beyond this weary way, behold! the sea!
The sea o'er-swept by clouds and winds and wings,
By thoughts and wishes manifold, whose breath
Is freshness and whose mighty pulse is peace.
Palter no question of the dim Beyond;
Cut loose the bark; such voyage itself is rest;
Majestic motion, unimpeded scope,
A widening heaven, a current without care.
Eternity!—Deliverance, Promise, Course!
Time-tired souls salute thee from the shore.

NOT IDLE, BUT PRESSING ON.

WITH God is our true life. We cannot go where He is not—but we can go blindly or carelessly, blindly in our own conceit, carelessly in our folly, or falsely in our own choosing of what is evil, in dishonest gain, in self-seeking, in base self-indulgence, in practical denial of what we know is right and good, the practical denial of God. These things lead to death, but God is the strength of our life. His eternal law of goodness is written in our hearts, and if we will but attend to it with reverent care, with brave endeavour, with the trustfulness of true humility, we shall understand and know that He is with us, leading us in the path of life. With God it is joy to be alive, even amid natural sorrow, to find the deeper blessedness, even amid evil, to be fighters for the truth, to be on the side of righteousness, to be helpers, strengtheners of the good, fellow-workers with God, who is ever helping and doing good through the hearts and hands of faithful men.

What we have done and what we have been in the past lives with us to-day—the good to strengthen our true life, the evil to be grappled with and overcome, and not, unless we will, to spoil our future. We are not here to be tossed about by every impulse, to be the slaves of that which can enslave and destroy; we are here to be masters of ourselves, by holding sacred the trust of honour and the talents for good work, which God has given—masters of ourselves, that we may be given up to Him, and know what it is to live and work as children of God. Hard as the fight may sometimes be, by His grace we can overcome, for He goes with us, He watches with us. In His strength we may be strong. The victory is for them that trust in God.

Robertson once said:—"Life, like war, is a series of mistakes, and he is not the best Christian nor the best general who makes the fewest false steps; he is best who wins the most splendid victories by the retrieval of mistakes. Forget mistakes—organise victory out of mistakes."

For this the New Years come to us, and we have the open future. There is the promise of life here and hereafter for everyone, through the unchanging goodness of our God. But we must make our way onward into the better future—we cannot drift idly into it. We have to work out our own salvation, through the energy of self-surrender, a passionate clinging to the good, the brave, and persistent doing of common duties. The New Year comes to us with fresh appeal for undaunted service, with the impulse of a glorious hope, for it is God who shows to us the path of life, and in His presence there is fulness of joy.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Truth teaching inwardly.

BLESSED is the soul which heareth the Lord speaking within her, and receiveth from His mouth the word of consolation. Blessed are the ears that gladly receive the pulses of the Divine whisper, and give no heed to the many whisperings of this world. Blessed indeed are those ears which listen not after the voice which is sounding without, but for the Truth teaching inwardly. Blessed are the eyes which are shut to outward things, but intent on things eternal. Blessed are they that enter far into things internal and endeavour to prepare themselves more and more, by daily exercises, for the receiving of Heavenly secrets. Blessed are they who are glad to have time to spare for God, and shake off all worldly impediments. Consider these things, O my soul, and shut up the door of thy sensual desires, that thou mayest hear what the Lord thy God shall speak in thee.

The children of Israel in times past said unto Moses, "Speak thou unto us, and we will hear: let not the Lord speak unto us, lest we die."

Not so, Lord, not so, I beseech Thee: but rather with the prophet Samuel, I humbly and earnestly entreat, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth." Let not Moses speak unto me, nor any of the prophets, but rather do Thou speak, O Lord God, Inspirer and Enlightener of all the prophets; for Thou alone without them canst perfectly instruct me, but they without Thee can profit nothing. They indeed may sound forth words, but they cannot give the Spirit. Most beautifully do they speak, but if Thou be silent, they inflame not the heart. They teach the letter, but Thou openest the sense: they bring forth mysteries, but Thou unlockest the meaning of sealed things. They declare Thy commandments, but Thou helpest us to fulfil them. They point out the way, but Thou givest strength to walk in it. What they can do is only without, but Thou instructest and enlightenest the heart. They water outwardly, but Thou givest fruitfulness. They cry aloud in words, but Thou impartest understanding to the hearing.

Let not Moses therefore speak unto me, but Thou, O Lord my God, the Everlasting Truth; lest I die, and prove unfruitful, if I be only warned outwardly and not kindled within. Lest it turn to my condemnation—the word heard and not fulfilled, known and not loved, believed and not observed. Speak therefore, Lord, for Thy servant heareth: for Thou hast the words of eternal life. Speak Thou unto me, to the comfort, however imperfect, of my soul, and to the amendment of my whole life, and to Thy praise and glory and honour everlasting.—From the Imitatio Christi.

LITERATURE.

THEOLOGIA PECTORIS.*

THIS is a small book, especially when we compare it with some recent theological works on the same subject; but the want of bulk only adds to its value, for it enables those who want an introduction to this subject to master its contents without undue demands upon time or sustained effort. The book is admirably adapted to the need of intelligent men and women, who, while unable to study the more technical treatises intended for students, yet are anxious to learn what does remain of Religious Faith and Doctrine when the old external authorities in Religion are abandoned and reliance is placed upon the Intuitions and Experiences of the Human Soul. If systematic Theology abandon its pretensions to dogmatic authoritativeness and assumes more and more an apologetic character, what will be the contents of that theology, and will they prove in any real sense of the word, a gospel—will they teach the way of Salvation? This is the question which men and women are anxiously asking. It is this question which Dr. Hodgson will help them to answer by a careful perusal of this little book. Its aim and method are summed up in the following passage, taken from the Introductory Chapter:—

The true foundation of a system of Theology, as a Science and a philosophy, would seem to be the nature, condition, and needs of man. Hence, also, the proper starting point for the experience of such a system is found in the doctrine of man, rather than, as has very generally been assumed, either in the doctrine of God, or the doctrine of Christ as the manifestation of the nature and purpose of God, or in some à priori conception as to be nature of salvation. In the past, theologians have, for the most part, assigned the foremost place in their discussion of a scheme of thought about the verities of religion to the nature and attributes of God. In more recent years the tendency has been to treat Theology as Christo-centric. But the more philosophical method is, it is urged, to begin with the consideration of what man is and what man needs in order that, from the actual state in which he finds himself, he may attain to the ideal condition towards which his spiritual faculties point, and more or less distinctly impel him; and then to proceed to the consideration of that which it is believed has been provided and presented outside of himself as the means and the power whereby he may become what he feels he was meant to be, but cannot of himself attain unto.

Dr. Hodgson proceeds, therefore, at once with a brief examination of the nature of Man, and insists that in that nature there are the spiritual elements which "may be taken to include what are known as the sentiments of awe, wonder, and admiration: the impulses of affection and enthusiasm; the sense of order, of purpose, of goodness, and of obligation; and the instinct of reverence." Then he at once proceeds from this position to discuss the Psychology of Theism, with the result that we learn "Our faith in the existence of a Personal God, as the Creator and sustainer of the Universe, is thus seen to be essentially the instinctive impulse of our nature."

* "Theologia Pectoris: Outlines of Religious Faith and Doctrine founded on Intuition and Experience." By James Muscutt Hodgson, M.A., D.Sc., D.D., Principal of the Theological Hall of the Congregational Churches of Scotland. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 3s. 6d.)

Then follow chapters on "The Media of Revelation," "The Meaning of the Miraculous," "The Nature of Inspiration," "The Grounds of Certitude," "The Nature of Sin," "The Mediation and Divinity of Christ," "The Ideal of Personal Character and the Ideal of Social Life."

It is evident from the contents that the work is intended primarily for those who have been brought up in the so-called "Evangelical" faith, and these will find the book of greatest value, because from it they will learn that it is rather the form than the contents of that faith which they have to re-adjust when they accept the standpoint of Intuition and Experience. But the book will prove of no less value to those of the "Liberal" school, if they will only carefully examine the grounds upon which Dr. Hodgson claims that Intuition and Experience lead us to claim the help of Mediation in working out our Salvation, and how in Christ we find a revelation of the Forgiveness and Help of God.

Of course, in the presentation of the contents of Intuitions and Experience, the question must inevitably arise whether some of these contents are not rather of the nature of "survivals" than the immediate outcome of intuition. For example, in discussing the Nature and the Penalty of Sin, Dr. Hodgson assumes that man is "a fallen creature," and that therefore instinctively recognises that pain and sorrow and death are the rightful penalties of sin. But for those who believe in the "Ascent of Man, rather than his descent or Fall," as the fundamental fact on which all human nature, and therefore Character, rests, it is impossible to accept physical pain and death as the penalties of that which was long subsequent to them in order of time. If man was subject to pain and death, and the sorrows which they entail, ages before he was conscious of any law of righteousness, the violation of which is sin, how can we accept them as the penalty of sin? If, moreover, pain and death have been the means by which men have learned some of the most spiritual lessons of life, dare we call that "evil" which is the greatest discipline of love to us? What we call death is the great transfiguration which reveals to us the worth of human affection and character. It is not in anger or as a retribution that God sends it. It is the messenger of His love. How else are our highest human affections and sympathies educated, save as we minister to pain and suffering? Moreover, it is as we rise in the scale of existence that we become liable to pain and suffering. The more developed we are, physically, morally, spiritually, the more are we able to suffer, the more do we suffer. The primitive man hardly knows what pain is. It is the artist, the musician, the man of mental culture and refinement who knows what "nerves" are, and what suffering really means. So, too, it is only as we become conscious of what godliness means, and seek to be reconciled to God do we begin to feel the real degradation of sin. It is not the sinner but the saint who feels the true nature of the penalty sin entails. The true solution of the mystery of pain lies in the fact that we are members one of another, and that in a very real and literal sense we can bear one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ in seeking to redeem our neighbour not merely by doing great things but by bearing much. There is no greater source of help and comfort to the suffering soul than the assurance that by the endurance of pain he is none the less serving God and the neighbour, and taking up the cross to follow his Master. A NEW ENGLAND VETERAN.*

A man he seems of cheerful yesterdays
And confident to-morrows.

THESE words from the Excursion suggested to the wife of Colonel Higginson the very happy title of his charming chapters of autobiography. I remember, some thirty years ago, attending a meeting at South-place Chapel, I think—at any rate under the inspiration of Mr. Moncure Conway—convened for the union of all religious thinkers. The movement went the way of the Free Christian Union, and many other premature attempts to get the Kingdom of Heaven established right off. But such efforts are never lost; and the chief thing I gained on this occasion was an abiding impression of the magnetic personality of the parson-colonel, Thomas Wentworth Higginson. At that time about forty-five years of age, he showed little trace of the terrible illness by which he was prostrated in the Civil War. Erect as an arrow, with an eye full of eager life, and a voice sweet with the music of goodness, he made a speech, American to the core, but packed with good sense, kindness, and the enthusiasm of freedom. He was just the man from whom one might expect thirty years later a tale of "Cheerful Yesterdays," and I count it my great good fortune that his genial reminiscences have fallen into my hands.

Those to whom the name of Colonel Higginson is not familiar, must know that he was a Harvard student in the early forties, when young America was beginning to feel that the making of a nation was the task lying to its hands, that he afterwards became a Unitarian minister at Newburyport, but having turns of thought in religion and politics hardly acceptable to his respectable congregation in that town, he moved on to the Worcester Free Church, one of the societies which sprang from the influence of Theodore Parker, and which were summed up by a shoemaker of a critical turn as being of the "Jerusalem wildcat" description. Here he remained till letters drew him for their own, and from 1848 onwards literature and politics engrossed his mind. He was among the founders and contributors of the Atlantic Monthly, the fountain of American literature. He tells us that before that magazine appeared Irving and Cooper—strange conjunction!—were the only great names in Transatlantic letters. The Atlantic gathered together in its pages Emerson, Hawthorne, Whipple, Lowell, Holmes, Alcott, Longfellow, and others of not inferior fame; and Colonel Higginson has pleasant little bits of chat about many of them. He took an active part in the anti-slavery struggle, and he describes how that great and stirring cause made orators. But his great distinction in the history of his nation is that he commanded a negro regiment in the Civil War.

By the brave and cheery force of his personality he infused into men crushed by life-long slavery the spirit of the free, and nurtured black patriots for his country's service. The volume contains interesting and lively chapters on Literary London and Literary Paris twenty years ago. It terminates with a bright and pleasant epilogue in which the Colonel looks out upon the world from a septuagenarian Reformer's point of view. There are many things he would like to live to see: international arbitration, civil service reform, free trade, legal and educational equality of the sexes—no one should leave unread his famous essay, "Should Women learn the Alphabet?"—honest municipal government, abolition of private monopoly, drunkenness extirpated, absolute religious freedom, an American literature purged of the last traces of colonialism. A goodly programme: but "to those who were living when the American nation lifted and threw off from its shoulders the vast incubus of human slavery, what other task can seem too great to be accomplished?"

Pages might be filled with quotations from "Cheerful Yesterdays" rich with a singular charm. But I prefer to send the reader to seek them for himself in this interesting and delightful volume.

R. A. ARMSTRONG.

AN HUNGARIAN BOOK OF DEVOTION.

PROFESSOR GEORGE BOROS, who very ably fills the Chair of Theology at the University of Kolozsvár, in Hungary, has recently published a beautifully-worded little Manual of Devotions and Meditations, specially arranged for the use of girls and women of every age. It is entitled "Szivemet Hozzád Emelem," [Keep me in Remembrance] and is divided into five parts, including, besides morning and evening prayers for every day of the week and every religious festival of the year, others appropriate for private use upon every possible occasion.

The design of this volume is, to quote the author's own words, an endeavour to assist our sex on its journey through life by familiarising our minds with forms of pious petition adequately expressive of all the varied emotions of joy or sorrow, anger or pity, contrition or hope, that most of us experience at different periods of our earthly career.

I look upon life as an Epic containing several themes. At one moment the page of our existence is flooded with golden sunlight; the next it grows dangerously dark and the lines are full of perils, temptations, calamities, bereavements, with all the suffering that they bring in their train. Woman, as girl, as wife, or as mother being more sensitive and susceptible than man, specially needs a friend and counsellor to whom she can turn at any moment and under any circumstances. Such a friend for her I have endeavoured to render myself by means of my modest volume, and I sincerely hope that its contents may prove a source of help and consolation to many a womanly heart.

So wrote Professor Boros when sending me his Manual. Following out this plan it contains prayers suitable to be used on betrothal, marriage, the birth and death of children, loss of parents, funeral of friends, widowhood; meditations on the frivolity of youth, the loneliness of old age, the hardships of poverty, the perils of wealth, the blessing of health, the chastening effects of illness, the errors of backbiting, family quarrels and bad temper, as well as exhortations for strength against all the temptations of "the world, the flesh, and the devil," from which, as he seems fully to comprehend, woman is not more free than man. The book ends with a charmingly simple hymn, the last line of which embodies the words of the title: "Szivemet hazzád emelem."

Professor Boros, as our readers are aware, has been familiar with English since the years he spent in London at Manchester New College; and some day he may, perhaps, give us a translation of his little book.

BEEBY'S "CREED AND LIFE."

SIR,—In your very interesting Retro-spect of the Year 1898, referring to my book, "Creed and Life," you pronounce its heterodoxy extreme, and instance, in proof, that I advocate "a doctrine of Christ which, in the author's view, Trinitarian and Unitarian might equally accept." I shall esteem it a favour if you will allow me a word in explanation of my position. What I have said is, "I think we can all unite here, Trinitarians or Unitarians, or whatever name we go by. And if, as I said, we kept to scriptural terms there would be little occasion for dispute." Where I think Christians can unite is expressly set forth—namely, in the Creed of the gospel according to St. John, that the life of Christ in human flesh is the manifestation of the Eternal Life (1 St. John, i. 1-3). I have not said that on other lines of thought Christians of different denominations may not find causes, and even real grounds of difference. But I am prepared to show that our differences to a certain extent are mere verbal distinctions, on subjects of dispute formerly regarded by Christians of the fourth and fifth centuries of supreme importance, which to us to-day have very largely lost their meaning. Whether one takes exception to, or approves, my suggestion of a possible union of belief among Christians of different denominations will depend very much on the personal condition, whether there be experienced a real desire to find a common ground of union, or whether the ethical value of our churchmanship be felt to consist rather in the emphasising of theological differences. Those who desire to find a common ground of union will approve my observation, that the first condition of Christian Union is a reference to Scripture and a holding fast to scriptural terms. I approach the Creed from the opposite principle from that by which Unitarians generally in former ages have approached it. The central article of my belief is the Incarnation, whereas Unitarians have started from the principle of Deism. At the same time, chiefly due to the fact that Unitarians are now learning to approach Christology from the Athanasian point of view, there is a marked approach to a common faith on the part of such men as Dr. James Martineau or the Rev. J. Page Hopps and Canon Basil Wilberforce. Such men do approach one another in a common faith as expressed in the terms of the New Testament. In his "Revelation and Modern Theology Contrasted," Prebendary C. A. Row insists on the supreme importance of keeping to Scriptural expressions, and concludes, that "the only truths, which can claim the character of infallibility, are God's express revelations, in the precise form in which they have been communicated." He adds much more to the same effect, fully confirming almost every word I have said on the subject. While, therefore, I am fully prepared to take the due measure of odium which is sure to attach to everyone who ventures to translate ancient terms into modern thought, I think you cannot properly place my heterodoxy beyond that either of Rashdall's "Doctrine and Development," or Llewellyn Davies' "Spiritual Apprehension," and especially not on the grounds on which you regard it as extreme.

CHARLES E. BEEBY.

Yardley Wood Vicarage, Jan. 3.

[We have the sincerest admiration for Mr. Beeby's courage and no less sincere sympathy with his attempt to put greater reality of spiritual life into the doctrinal teaching of the Church. We only wish that the terms of subscription in the Church of England were such as to make it the natural thing for a clergyman of vigorous and independent mind and of great religious earnestness thus to re-interpret ancient doctrine in the light of the knowledge and the needs of to-day. When Mr. Beeby connects Unitarian methods of thought with Deism, that seems to us rather ancient history. Since Channing the spiritual interpretation of religion has increasingly prevailed with us, and Theism rather than Deism is the right term for our doctrine of God. If we understand Mr. Beeby's statement of the doctrine of the Incarnation, it is what most thoughtful Unitarians would now accept.—ED. INQ.]

THE PLEA FOR A MANUAL.

SIR,—I think we owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Barrow for his suggestive paper on the above subject, and hope that it may take some practical form before long, as such a book should be a great help, especially in the Home and Sunday-school. No doubt it is a high ideal that no form of words is needed for our prayers, but though no one particular form may be needed, some form of prayer is often very helpful. Dr. Martineau (in the preface to "Home Prayers") suggests four classes of mind who need such help, and, after referring to a former scruple that printing prayers seemed a "vicarious intermeddling with the free devotion of souls unknown," he says:—"I own, however, to some gradual softening of this scruple. Perhaps it may be the declining strength of life which induces a natural sympathy with the varieties of mental dependence that cannot even confess their helplessness without an interpreter; the child's scanty conscience and unready mood; the wandering thoughts of the untrained mind; the slow compunctions of the self-satisfied; the dry affections of the too prosperous. At all events I am more aware than I was of the need of fellowship in the spiritual life, and less disposed to trust to its pure spontaneity."

There are probably some beautiful children's prayers already in existence, if they could be collected from the mothers who have worded them for their own children from year to year, for no one knows like a mother the little wants and difficulties of the growing child. Such a collection in the manual would be of use to many parents, who, though truly religious themselves, are apt to take it for granted that children can be left without guidance in this matter, beyond learning a simple infant's prayer, and (probably before they can be understood) the beautiful words of the "Lord's Prayer." Moreover, a collection of children's prayers would be rich in suggestions to Sunday-school teachers who occasionally conduct children's services, as well as for use in their classes. At the last annual meeting of the Liverpool Sunday School Union the Hon. Mrs. Klein and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong both spoke earnestly of the need for all teachers to help and encourage their scholars to pray; and that, however well we might teach other subjects, unless we succeeded in this our Sunday-schools were of little use. So far the Essex Hall Sunday School Association has provided helps for teachers in most subjects, but in this, perhaps the most difficult, the teacher is left without the guidance of the experienced.

Living in a seaport town, where so many of our Sunday scholars go to sea, one realises the help that a little book like the proposed manual might be to the sailor-lad when far from home. The Norwegian Prayer Book includes a few special prayers for the use of its sea-faring folk, who are exposed to special temptations and dangers. Our English nation comprises a large proportion of sailors, travellers, and colonists, while even at home many Unitarian and Postal Mission adherents living far from a church of their own would value such a manual, and find it a help when two or three gather together for Sunday worship.

I do not think set liturgies will ever find a home in any of our churches for long together. We are too "free-born" for them, and probably the wish "to try a liturgy" which arises from time to time may proceed from a natural longing on the part of the young or the less cultured, to have some familiar words of prayer as well as familiar songs of praise. We love the well-known hymn or psalm, not only for its own classic beauty, but also because it brings with it many tender and sacred associations that help us. True there is a danger of familiar words being used carelessly or too quickly, but this is a danger that may be avoided. I knew an old clergyman who had always been in the habit of using the church service morning and evening, but whether one heard him on week days in his own home or on Sundays in his church, one felt the truth of a parishioner's remark:—"Mr. — does not read the prayers, he prays them." Each minister should have freedom to arrange the services to suit himself and his people, but in addition to his own prayers he could select from the suggested manual something for each service that would be familiar to the children, and others, such as a general confession, thanks—giving, collect, &c., which they might perhaps all repeat together without book. In this way Mr. Barrow's idea could be carried out without losing what is so precious to many of us, the free outpouring of our own beloved and devoted ministers. I also think it would be found helpful if at some part of each service the minister would ask all to unite in a period of silence for inward prayer, as suggested in Dr. Martineau's Ninth service.

OLD LAMPS FOR NEW—A NEW YEAR'S ADDRESS.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."—Psalm cxix. 105.

Most of you, probably, have read the story of "Aladdin and his Wonderful Lamp." If so, you remember that when Aladdin rubbed his lamp, a genie—or kind of fairy—appeared, who called himself "the slave of the lamp," and who promised, so long as Aladdin retained the lamp, to do for him whatever he wanted. And I am quite sure you remember, also, how at the request of Aladdin this wonderful genie not only supplied him with as much money as he needed, but gave him also great dishes filled with all kinds of precious stones, and, more wonderful still, a palace to live in, more rich and beautiful than anyone before had seen, and to crown all, how he obtained for him as wife the Sultan's daughter, a lovely and beautiful princess. All this you remember; but do you also remember how, in the midst of all this prosperity and splendour, this glitter of silver and of gold, this endless show of horses and carriages and servants, there suddenly came to Aladdin a terrible misfortune? His lamp was gone, and with it was gone, too, horses, carriages, servants, the beautiful princess, and even the palace itself. All had disappeared.

And the way it came about was this: There was a man who called himself Aladdin's uncle, but who was really a wicked magician, whose only wish was to do Aladdin harm. This wicked magician resolved that he would steal the lamp. So hearing by chance that Aladdin had gone away on a hunting expedition for a week, he dressed himself up in the oldest and shabbiest clothes that he could find, and procuring a large basket hung it on his arm as though he were a hawker. This basket he had already furnished with twelve new copper lamps, all brightly polished. He then went with his basket into the city and down the street in which the palace of Aladdin stood. As he went he cried, "Who will change old lamps for new? Who will change old lamps for new?"

The people who heard him thought that he was mad, and the boys, crowding round him, hooted and jeered and called him all kinds of insulting names. But the wicked old man knew only too well what he was doing, and so took no notice. At length he came exactly in front of the palace of Aladdin, and just opposite the windows of the Princess. "Who will change old lamps for new?" he cried. "Who will change old lamps for new?" At this the Princess's maids ran to look out at the windows, and asked what all the noise was about. "A silly old man," was the answer, "offering to change new lamps for old." By-and-by the maids told the Princess, and the Princess, when she heard it, said "If that's the case, up in the Prince's dressing-room is an ugly old lamp which I am sure we had better get rid of; bring it down and let the old man have it." So the maids ran up to the Prince's dressing-room, and very quickly brought the old lamp down, knowing no more than their mistress how precious it was. "Take it down into the street," said the Princess, "and get the old man to give us a new one instead." And this they did. So soon as the old man saw the lamp he knew he had got what he wanted, and, offering in exchange any one of the twelve that the servants fancied, he disappeared.

Very soon the poor Princess began to find how bad a bargain she had made, for directly her troubles began. The wicked magician had commanded the genie to transport the palace, and in it the Princess, across the seas; so when the Prince, her husband, returned from his hunting he found that he had lost his wife and lost his palace, and this, without hope, as it seemed at first, of finding them again.

Now I have told you afresh this old, and, to some of you, perhaps, familiar story, because it seems to me to supply us with an excellent New Year's parable. And this parable I will try now to expound.

Each one of us has in his possession a lamp more wonderful, and far more valuable than that of Aladdin. A little lamp, it may be, and giving as yet but a little light, but still most precious. And this also there is: the more we value this lamp the more we use it, and the more faithfully we obey it the larger will it become and the brighter the light it will emit. This lamp is intended to show us the way in which we should walk through the pilgrimage of life. It is intended to show us how to act and how to speak, and even how to think. And if only we are true to it, and "hide it"—as the Psalmist says—"within our hearts," it will do this for us more and more.

The lamp is an old lamp—old as the first man—who looked up to God and asked for light to know the right and for strength to do it. This was the lamp of which the man who wrote this wonderful psalm was thinking when he said, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." It was the lamp of which St. John was thinking when he wrote, "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine upon it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the lamp thereof." The word of God, the mind of God, the will of God—read or heard or felt within our hearts—that is the lamp by which we are to walk.

Now I want to tell you of our danger—it is the very danger that beset Aladdin and his beautiful Princess. It is that some power, like the wicked magician, may come and steal away the lamp out of our hearts and out of our lives. And the way in which these powers of evil work is very much the same as that in which, as the story tells us, the African magician worked. These powers put on dresses and disguises, and walk beneath the palace windows of our lives, and as they walk they cry, "New lamps for old; new lamps for old—bring out the old—Conscience, Duty, Truth—and have the new—all bright and fresh—instead."

Sometimes the evil power comes gaily dressed, and its name is Pleasure. And Pleasure says, "What is the use of being so particular and good? Why not enjoy yourself? Youth is the time for enjoyment. Young people ought to be merry; when you are old, it will be time enough to be sad."

Sometimes the evil, tempting power comes dressed in sober, solemn garb, like a merchant or a trader, with a bag of money in his hand, and then he says, "What is the good of being too honest? That is not the way to get on in a world like this. 'Every man for himself, and the Devil take the hindmost'—that's the motto for the man who wants to succeed." And so he tempts men to exchange their old lamps—of a good name, and a good conscience, and a good character—for the new lamp, sometimes called "getting on." But it is a bad exchange, for while the old lamp brought inward peace and outward esteem, the new lamp brings misery and punishment and shame.

Sometimes the Tempter comes dressed in easy, flowing robes as one who does no work and knows no care, and his name is Indolence or Sloth. And he asks those whom he tries to tempt, and most of all those whom he thinks are young and foolish, why they should work so hard and why they should climb the rough, steep path called duty, when the pleasant fields of ease and enjoyment lie so close beside them. "In a hundred years," he says, "what difference will it make?"

So beneath our palace windows does one or other of these tempters come. And then the little Princes and Princesses look out and listen to their cry, "New lamps for old; new lamps for old." And those who are foolish among them bring out the rusty, old lamps, as they think them, of duty and conscience and obedience and purity and goodness, and exchange them for the new ones of selfishness and pleasure and greed. And then trouble comes, and their palace is removed, or seems to be so, from the sunny land where the king their father lives, to the "far country," where there is only misery and loss and shame.

At the beginning of this New Year, with all its days before you, what choice will you make? Shall it be the old lamp of God's word and will, or the new lamp of foolishness and sin? I counsel you to say, and to say with all your heart, "Thy word shall be a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." JOHN BYLES.

LONDON, JANUARY 7, 1899.

WITH GIRDED STRENGTH.

THE New Year comes to us with its fresh opportunities direct from God. This is no time to slacken our endeavours; but with new courage to press on, with strength that is not of ourselves alone, but devoted with reverence to the service of the HIGHEST, drawing its nurture from the bountiful Source of all good.

New Year's Day is in itself, of course, only a matter of convention. We might have chosen May Day, or October 1st, or any other, for the beginning of our year. But that would make no difference. Having once agreed upon the day and adopted this habit of marking off our passing time, when the hour has struck we know that one year is ended and the new year begun. Of another period of our life the record is complete. What we have to do now is to make the present better than the past, and this we can do, not by presumptuous self-confidence, but by giving ourselves up in completer loyalty to God and to His service. Our strength is to be girded up for better work in the joyful confidence that our calling is of God, that we are to be servants of His truth, workers of righteousness in His kingdom, children to whom is open the gladness of unclouded love. We have our own place of service, and in all humility and thankfulness, we may add, our own place in the great household of God. And while we seek faithfully to do our own work and to bear our testimony to truth we have the added happiness of this faith, that all alike are embraced in the same infinite compassion and in the care of the Eternal Goodness. We do not claim any exclusive salvation, or any superior virtue, but whatever men may think or say of us, we declare our faith in human brotherhood, and in a progressive spiritual life, in which we can rejoice unfeignedly in the gifts and the achievements of others, even while our service must be in different ways. Towards the Eternal Truth and the perfect life with God we all aspire, and while we occupy our own post of duty and have our own vision, which is of God, we are thankful to learn of our brethren, and thankful also if we can be of any service to them. Our constant prayer is to be kept from all sectarian bitterness and self-conceit, and to be united with all earnest and humble-hearted workers for the kingdom of God.

For more than fifty years THE INQUIRER has been dedicated to the service of Truth, and of a religious life nurtured in spiritual freedom. And in entering on the work of a New Year we are more deeply impressed than ever with the need in the religious life of this country of such Free Churches as those with which it is our happiness to be most closely associated. There is need of all the churches in the land, and more than all, for the purifying and uplifting of our common life, the testimony of righteousness, the witness to the unseen things which are eternal, for the deepening of a true sense of brotherhood, and drawing men into nearer communion with God. And while the great dogmatic Churches are closing up their ranks and emphasising their exclusive claims, there is special need that we should maintain in our Free Churches a religious fellowship truly catholic, and the strength of a living faith, unhindered by dogmatic limitations, and having its foundation in present spiritual conviction of the inward life with God.

There are, therefore, two urgent claims pressed upon us: that we should do our part in feeding the world's hunger for spiritual things, ministering to all the deeper needs of the soul; and at the same time in that very ministry bear our witness to truth, and prove by the testimony of our own religious life that there is a wider fellowship of the children of God and the followers of CHRIST, where in spite of exclusion and anathema are found the richest fruits of the spirit. Then there will be none but those who are blinded by bigotry, who will deny that the truth which has possessed our souls is effectual for the completest service, and does lead men to God.

At the very heart of the life of every church must be the constant aspiration after truer prayer, a more perfect spirit of devotion; and this is not to be compassed by the service of any one man, it must be the endeavour of a whole people, gathered together in the overshadowing of the Divine Presence, with reverent and humble hearts, both seeking and ministering peace and strength, enlightenment, cleansing and gladness of spirit for all who are drawn into that fellowship. This must be chief among the aspirations of the New Year, that more of that true life may be kindled in our Churches, and to them may be given the great joy of larger and more effectual service. For such true prayer does not begin and end in the moments of united worship, it becomes a quickening spirit in the whole of life, binding men together in a new brotherhood, giving new understanding of the FATHER'S will, and new strength to do it. In the quietness of the inward sanctuary and in the work, which must be made a genuine prayer to the living God, we hear the same call for self-surrender, and for that seeking to which is given new vision of things divine, and new grace to help and to bless.

To this endeavour every church is consecrated. The special service, in addition to this, to which our Free Churches are called, is the demonstration of an effectual faith in spiritual freedom, as the basis of religious life, and the demonstration of that measure of truth which is given to us. Our Unitarianism has been a stumbling-block to many, for many different reasons. What is demanded of us is that we should be simply faithful to the truth as it is made clear to us, undismayed by prejudice and ungenerous depreciation, and prove that there is power in this truth to draw men together in the spiritual fellowship of the children of God. The world thinks, and occasionally says, curious things about Unitarians, and we are by no means prepared to defend everything that "Unitarians" have said and done; but our immediate concern is with the religious life of the Free Churches into which Unitarians are gathered, and there is a great opportunity of service for our people to show what this hated and despised Unitarianism really is, and how, in accordance with this truth, our religion in its completest and most gracious form is really at one with the religion of Jesus. We must bear whatever reproach attaches to the name Unitarian as applied to people of our way of thinking, and must slacken no effort to maintain the truth. But far beyond any controversial argument must be the endeavour to manifest the power of religion in it, to have in our Churches that spiritual faith which inspires the true followers of CHRIST, and unites men as children of the FATHER in heaven.

We do not desire, as Unitarians, to form a new sect, or to establish a "Unitarian Church" opposed to all other Churches in the land; what we are bound to, as servants of Divine truth, is to maintain that Unitarians have a rightful place in the fellowship of the children of God and among the followers of CHRIST, and that they have their own work to do in the religious service of the world, not alien to others, but in close sympathy with all who seek to worship God in spirit and in truth.

THE PULPIT.

THE NEW YEAR.

BY THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE,
M.A., LL.D.

It is well that the New Year begins in Winter, for Winter represents better than Spring or Summer the aspect of our lives as we look back to the past, and forward to the future. It is a mingled Retrospect, a mingled Prospect; mingled of pain and pleasure, of knowledge and ignorance, of failure and gain, of hope and despondence, of sloth and activity, of the desire to give up work, and the desire to continue it! Here, then, on the edge of the Old and New, we stand, like a windmill on a ridge of lofty hill, turning with the changing wind; now gazing on the country over which we have passed, now on the lands our soul has not yet felt. And as this images our place, so wintry Nature reflects our thought and feeling concerning what is done and what may be done in the little world we call our life.

One side of our thought is altogether sad, and is chiefly concerned with our Retrospect. How little have we realised of the aims with which we began the year—how much less of the larger aims with which we began our life! We tried, it seemed, all we could; but we did not fulfil the half we hoped for, or our trying itself was weak before temptation. We yielded up our ideal to pleasure, or laziness, or passion, or the world; perhaps scarcely an outline of it was made. It lies buried, as it were, beneath a frozen lake, lying like a corpse under the glassy sheet. We know our failure and our wrong, and bitter is the knowledge; bitter as the seducer's who sees the face of the woman he loved and betrayed look at him through the transparent ice, from the water in which she drowned her shame. And when we look on the countenance of our dead desire, it seems as if we could never repair the wrong, or recover the right.

That is one sadness of Retrospect. There is another sadness which is not always our fault. We have suffered loss. Those have departed from our side last year whose voices we shall never hear again on earth, whose heart may never beat on ours again, in the old familiar way. Since then, the world is half a shadow. It is hard to catch reality. We have not only lost our loved, we have lost a great part of ourselves. It is gone with the others into the far-off country.

Or we have lost reputation, competence; or friendship, or love that we dreamed were for ever safe—and now we look on a wintry world. The snow lies deep on the past, the freezing wind blows over it; but there is a bitterer wind within, and we shiver when we think of living.

There is even a worse sadness. It is that of feeling that we are growing, not graver, but duller; less eager, animated, keen; less pleased with the movement of life, less fond of singing on the way, having less faith in man, less love to give, less power of receiving joy—settling down into scornful, or regretful or embittered apathy; dying while yet we live. This is the true winter of the soul, and it is all the colder, and the springs of being are all the more deeply frozen by it, when we boast of our apathy, or think it wisdom to scorn the world.

Often, as we look back, this desperation seems to rush on us like a darkness; and for the moment we think that henceforward there is nothing more than "the set grey life, the apathetic end," or cynicism, most stupid of all the fiends. Indeed, it is not only now, at such an anniversary, that this fear besets us. There are passing hours of this in every life—when all eagerness seems at an end, when every interest in life is like the frozen snow, like the leafless woods.

This is the sadness in our Retrospect. But there is another side to our thinking; just as, if we could get to the other side of the thunder clouds, we should see them dazzling in the sunlight. Something has been done, life has not all been failure or wrong. Some portion at least of our aim has been accomplished; and we look at that to-day, and in the name of God take courage. Even if only a patch of it has been wrought out, we may take it up and work it into a noble web of good. A steadfast and good heart makes the little into the great. But many of us if we have been working at all, have got into clear form, useful to men, more than a little of thought and act. It is fitting that we should think humbly of what we have done; but taken into God's hands and in His sight, our little may be more than we think it to be. The half sometimes means the whole, or secures the whole. Then, too, all success is slow, and we must learn to understand that. When we understand it, we shall not be so ready to cry out that we have failed. It is decay, degradation, ruin, real failure, which is swift. Life walks quietly from point to point; corruption gallops. So it is with all good work.

And in the region of moral right and wrong, your descent into wrong would be quick, if you were becoming as evil as in your despairing hour you think yourself to be. If the wrong in you were greater than the good, you would gallop into complete disintegration. But if, on the whole, you are moving into right, your progress is slow. It is half made up of resistance. Therefore take courage! God who hastes not is with you! So is Humanity, for as slowly as you move moves Humanity on its upward path. Look back, then, if you will, and have your sadness, but let the sadness be mingled with brightness. The clouds break as you gaze, and through the gap streams in the sunshine on the landscape of the past. It gleams, it may be, on a wintry world, but how the snowy fields are glittering now; and how lovely are the woods, though leafless, in the light of hope!

Then as to loss—it has been bitter; but have we gained no new love, no new friendship? Has no new tenderness, no new interest come into our life—not to quench the old love, but to fill the space its loss has left? If not, it is our own fault. We have allowed sorrow to close the doors of our heart, and to become a wicked enemy, not a helpful guest. For, indeed, we may turn our outward loss into a deeper loss. Our sorrow ought to have filled us with sweet memories, to have doubled the tenderness of associations, to have made us less and less selfish whenever we thought of those no more with us, whose life on earth had been so fair, so inspiring, and so true. But we have thought of nothing but ourselves and our own pain!—and changed the honey of grief into gall. Loss, then, has made a greater loss. It ought to have been otherwise. Outward loss should have made inward gain, and if you win and grasp it, your winter world will warm, not freeze, your heart. Love of man finds that gain, and finding, keeps it. It is the power of sympathy won through the knowledge of sorrow. The exercise of wise sympathy wins the hearts of those with whom we sympathise; and we gain from them treasures of affection. Moreover, if our grief be selfish and shut us out from men, we lose the power of loving, and in the end, growing cold of heart, we forget the lost for whom we grieve. But when we go forth from our grief to help the sorrow of others, we keep our power of loving, and we never, having a warm heart, forget the loved whom we have lost on earth. Yes, love does not nurse its own grief, but nurses the griefs of others, and, in nursing them, retains the loving heart that never can forget the lost.

And, again, as to the loss of animation, eagerness and life in apathy—is it altogether true? Is it really apathy you feel, and not wrath, impatience with dullness, strong crying for a new spring in the soul? We call what we feel chill indifference; we call it scorn of life. Is it not often the very opposite—a sombre fire of indignation with our own incapacities of emotion which is ready to burst into a flame of action? Are we so cold as we think we are? Are we so dead? Do we not feel that we only need a touch of light, a ray of heat, a soft waft of the West wind of love to break up the frost we think enduring, to dissolve the snow?

Yes, half the folk who think themselves apathetic are as far from it as a silent volcano on the edge of an outburst. What we have to do is to refuse to believe in the possibility of apathy; to despise as contemptible our own scorn of life; to say within, "I will have life full, while I live"; to open our heart to loving. That is in our power. It is the natural thing to do. God is with us in that effort, for it is a strife for Love. Man is with us in it also, for it is also a strife for love. When we strive in that true fashion we know our life will be renewed. The wintry world should teach us that. Under the snow, under the sodden grass, the seeds of a new green garment, of a thousand thousand flowers are slowly winning life. On every barren wood a million million buds hold enclosed in furry sheath the multitudinous foliage, the new sprays of a vaster world than the wood has yet imagined. They are waiting—grass and flowers, and leaves and lissome branches—for the soft clarions of the spring. Under death is hidden life, under frost is slumbrous glow; under the white snow a glory of green; under silent apathy, singing of birds and joy of streams.

It is on this aspect of life which we should look in our hour of wintry sorrow, loss and gloom. Life awakens to a new spring, whenever Love, the sap of Life's tree, is still alive at its root. The coming years hold in them recovery from the darkest sorrow and the most desperate failure, if we do not live only in our own desires, but in the hearts of our friends, and in the hopes and ideals of mankind. Yes, if we continue to love, our soul, our daily life, are ready for the incessant opportunities of living nobly and beautifully which God is always sending us. We are blind to them if we are wrapt up in our sorrows or regrets. We see them, if we are unable to remember ourselves because we remember others. And when they come, when a new interest crosses our path, a new joy or a new love, a new inspiration for work—when these, like the winds of spring, pour their April music into our heart—we, for we love, are on fire to hail and welcome them. We open our life to their soft approaches, motion stirs in every fibre of our root, and runs up through every vein, till all our barren woods within are clothed with leaves, and life speeds again, with its divine madness, through every cell of the imagination and the will. Even, in age, we taste a new summer, we produce a new harvest. This is the lesson of Nature; it is also the prophecy for us of the grace of God our Father; it is still more—it is the call of Humanity upon us, and the blest experience of a thousand thousand lives.

Therefore, when we consider these things, it is time for us to look backward no more on what has been, but to look forward to all that we may make of the future, in the love of man and by the grace of God. It may be natural to look back at this time; it is even more natural to look onward. Beneath us, as we stand on the ridge, lies an unknown, an untried land, with adventures to be attempted, fresh woods and pastures new, rude battles in which to prove our courage and our fortitude, pleasant places full of waiting joys, new friends, new loves, new work, new life. Is no curiosity awake in you, no desire to penetrate the secrets of the year, no eagerness to strive and seek; to follow the gleam? Have you no heart for work which is certain to present itself, no wish to serve your fellow men in the days to come, no longing to run with patience the race set before you, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith?

Why, it is the natural thing that the year should open out new paths; it is in the common order. Of course, if you have drifted into a vague cynicism, or into the life which only thinks of how you will best feather your nest and best fit yourself into the groove of the world, you will see no paths, nothing but the dusty, crowded road. The selfish heart is by its very nature blind, and cross with life. But if you have the good temper of love and admiration, and the passion of life—such life as our wintry woods look forward to in spring—you are alert for new and brave experience. The past is forgotten; all its trouble, sin, failure, grumbling and apathy fly away before the cry—"The Bridegroom has come, go ye forth to meet Him." "The Master has come, and calleth for thee." There, already going down the hill before you, with the light of love around him, Jesus walks into the New Year, and waves to you to follow. And not only God within you, but your own human nature—eager for new life, and curious of love and goodness and labour—urges you to follow.

Only begin, and then the mind grows heated,

Attempt it, and the work shall be completed.

This is not only the natural, it is also the most human view of the matter. All around you, playing incessantly on your will and emotion, is the vast movement of human life, the marching music of humanity. Are we not also—though we have fallen for the moment out of the ranks while we make our retrospect—are we not also in the movement, part of the marching host? Shall we only think of ourselves in this hour—of our sins, our pains, our failures? That were indeed ignoble. Every man and woman in that great host have, like us, their sins, their sorrows, and their failures. Think of it, and forgetting your own sins help them, in the name of God and man, to redeem themselves from wrong! Forgetting your own pains, bear the pains of men; forgetting your own failures, lift your brothers out of failure. Set the lame upon their feet again; deliver the captives of guilt; love the sorrowful till they know joy again—and then you will redeem your sins, transmute into goodness your sorrows, turn your failures into victory, you will have won love by deeds of love; and he who loves dwells always in the triumph of beauty and joy. This is your call, the pull forward of the days before you. This is human; this keeps you in touch with all men and women except yourself—and no greater blessing than that happy state of self-forgetful being can I wish for you during the coming year.

Again, natural and human as it is to look forward bravely, it is also divine. It has its ground in faith in God, in the sure eternity and mastery of Righteousness and Love.

Whatever, then, we shall do and think in the future, in accordance with our Father's Love and Goodness, is absolutely certain of bringing forth its fruit. It is certain to become part, in the Eternal Love, of the vast work of the whole universe of Spirit for the glory and perfection of the whole. Why should we trouble, then, about any earthly failure of our own? In the end our failures will strengthen our hands to work! Why torment ourselves about the sins or the losses of the past? With God we can replace our sins by good, repair our losses in new activities. And why trouble beyond what is just about the misery of man? The trouble which is just, which everyone should have, is that deep compassion whose end is active help for the trouble. But when too lazy to help it, we dwell on the misery of man, in a wrath and scorn which we nurse over the fire in our armchair, we groan ourselves into sloth, into isolation from humanity! The commonest excuse for the cynic sloth which does nothing for the sorrows of humanity, is our sorrow for its sorrow—and a miserable excuse it is. Leave thinking of it, except in the act of helping it. When you are acting as a deliverer of man from pain and slavery, you may think about the pain and the oppression of man as much as you please; but to brood on it and do nothing, that is the wretchedest thing in the world, and the proper punishment of it is helplessness.

It is far otherwise if you clasp to your breast the noble faith of God in man. God is in us, our loving Father, leading us to our perfect end, and we must win our day. And God is in the world, educating men to live with Himself for ever. Then everything we do well and lovingly for man is part of His order, part of the redemption of mankind. The winter time is with mankind now. But when man has stored up enough of the force which comes of trouble beneath its snows, and enough of latent life from the fierce pressure of the frost, the Springtide of Humanity will come; and all that lay hidden beneath this wintry world will break forth in singing, and pass on into Summer.

Finally, all that I have said resolves itself into one question: Do you mean this year to live for yourself alone, or to live for other folk; to live for self-interest, or for self-forgetfulness? On the answer of your life to that depends whether you can set yourself free from the burdens of sin and failure and sorrow in the past, and go forward with courage, hope and alertness into the future.

To believe in self-interest alone is to believe in damnation; is to be divided from all power of helping Man or trusting God. It is to believe in the opposite of love, and that is the darkness of hell. As long as we are in that state we are lost souls, lost in a universe of falsehood. Put that lie then aside for ever. Take this year to the other; take to self-forgetfulness, take to loving. If, even after the deepest trouble, we can love enough to minister to the troubles of men and women, we shall get out of the huge falsehood that the world and we are ruined and doomed, and see into the truth of things. We do not deny that evil is in man, we give up the ignorant optimism of youth. But, if we search, believing in man's goodness, for goodness, we find it, as Jesus found it by the lamp of love, in the darkest corners of Humanity, and, drawing it to the light, we save the man in whom we find it and give him power to redeem his evil. If we refuse to let love go (no matter how bitter has been our experience), we find we can move and redeem the vilest. Nay more, there is no end to the sweet purity and goodness, to the common love and faithfulness, which now we find, like the daily flowers of the field, in the hearts of men and women. These are discoveries which steal the anger of life out of the soul, and finally banish it altogether. We settle down into gentleness, lovingkindness, joy and peace!

Then, with belief in man and love of him, we find God, the Father of men, and love Him also. All the bitter fierceness we had against Him, when we saw Him through our own selfishness, now vanishes away. We understand what He means for us by our life, and we accept His will. If we suffer, we know now it is for the good of the whole, and in the final good of all our own pain will be redeemed. So, a mellowed grace, born of communion with His immortal love and beauty, descends at last upon the soul; the same strong peace growing out of loving well which Jesus had, and which he left to his people. This deepens as the years go on. Every year makes it dearer; our soul every year is stronger, more loving more full of life. We have but one thing to say to the world, to live for in the world, but it is enough. It is that which the Apostle said to his people when he came to die, "Little children, love one another."

After the storms, then, there is for us, if we will, a quiet sunset. The evening of life is pure and sweet and clear. Slowly the light of this our day fades away; the stars come forth; and we wait in the silence of night and love. All is infinite peace.

At last, at midnight we are called by death; "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet Him!"

AN HONEST SOUL.

A STORY BY MARY E. WILKINS.

PERHAPS such story-writers as Ian Maclaren, or J. M. Barrie, are, in a sense, the best historians. They take a bit of Scotland which they really know, and give us, in story form, the very life and folk of the place, with just enough of the element of imagination—or touch of genius—in what they tell, to make the telling of it act with sympathetic power upon our minds.

Miss Wilkins is thoroughly New England. She belongs to that part of America on which the Puritans from Old England first settled. New England they called it. It is a fairly long and broad strip of country on the Atlantic sea coast, having Boston Bay as its centre.

For our purpose now I note only one special feature of this New England life. In leaving the old home here they had made a conscience of it. Indeed, that was their marked characteristic. For conscience' sake they became exiles and gave up most of the things which are hard to part with. They carried those high consciences with them. They made a conscience of everything they did, or promised, or said. And though conscientiousness may be carried to a point which ends, not in anything very moral but in mere fussy scrupulosity, yet we cannot but admire a race of men and women who lived like Milton

As ever in the great Task-master's eye,

And whose favourite hymn might be :

Let all thy converse be sincere,
Thy conscience as the noonday clear,
For God's all-seeing eye surveys,
Thy secret thoughts, thy works and ways.

It is just a patch, so to speak, of this New England life that Mary E. Wilkins has made her own. She knows it as only one can know it who has lived among it and is part of it. She loves it—its humour and pathos—its practical and its spiritual side—and interprets it for us as only one can who loves it, has a touch of genius to see it, and to say what she sees!

Miss Wilkins's stories are all short. It takes a dozen or fourteen of them to fill a small volume. But then they are perfect gems. There are very few authors who can write perfect short stories. Bret Harte can; Mary Wilkins can. Indeed, there are few now living to equal her.

She takes some character, some incident, some event in that New England life—now gradually passing away—and makes us see it as if we were there, and sympathise with it as if we were she. It is all very homely; and more often the characters in the stories are oldish, just because it is in them only that she can catch for us the disappearing characteristics of New England village life.

Her first book was entitled "A Humble Romance and other Stories," her next "A Far Away Melody and other Stories." Of course, they were published first in America, but, with her consent, they have also been published here, in two dainty 1s. vols., by David Douglas, of Edinboro', in his series of American authors, and may be picked up on almost any good railway bookstall, or at regular bookshops.

The story that I have chosen as a specimen is by no means her best, but it seemed the one best suited for my purpose. Its title is "An Honest Soul." It is a very simple tale of a woman, now elderly, living alone, and keeping body and soul together by doing patch-work—either quilts or rugs—for people. Poor she was; but, mind you! she was not beholden to anybody. She would have scorned the very idea.

"She was over seventy now—a small, slender old woman, as straight as a rail, with sharp black eyes, and a quick toss of her head when she spoke. She did odd housewifely jobs for the neighbours, wove rug carpets, pieced bed-quilts, braided rugs, &c., and contrived to supply all her simple wants."

Recollect it was only a scattered village she lived in. The house was her own—such as it was. I say "such as it was," not meaning to imply that it was old, or out of order, or broken down in any way; on the contrary, it was complete, such as it was, and spotlessly clean inside and out.

But the house was very odd. The fact is it was only half a house—and that, the back half, consisting of two rooms, and a lean-to shed for wood. This odd-looking house stood back from the road, and there was no window on the side facing the road. The truth is that when her father built the house, long ago, he could only build the back part of it then, and left the blank or middle wall facing the road, intending some day to finish it by building the front rooms to it. But he never did. And why? Let Mary Wilkins tell us—and you will see in him again the characteristic of the Puritan:—

"Simeon came of a hard-working, honest race, whose pride it had been to keep out of debt, and he was a true child of his ancestors. Not a dollar would he spend that was not in his hand; a mortgaged house was his horror. And that was how it came about that old Simeon, years ago, when the longing for a home of his own had grown strong in his heart, and he had only a few hundred dollars saved from his hard earnings, had wisely done the best he could with what he had. Not much remained to spend on the house after the land was paid for, so he resolved to build as much house as he could with his money, and complete it when better days should come."

That time never came; he died in the course of a few years, after a lingering illness, and only had enough saved to pay his doctor's bill and funeral expenses, and leave his wife and daughter entirely without debt in their little fragment of a house on the big sorry plot of land.

There they had lived, mother and daughter, earning and saving in various little ways, keeping their heads sturdily above water. Then the mother died, and the daughter, Martha, took up the little homely struggle alone.

Just fancy her! Alone, yet not unneighbourly in the least. She was on good terms with all, respecting and respected. But she had no time for anything except work, and the years sped away, and she had grown, as I have said, to the age of seventy, toiling mainly within those four walls of that lower back room with nothing to look at through the back window except a bit of green grass, a dandelion now and again, at rare times a bird, and one family of children on their way to and from school once a day, passing that back way by a short cut. These were her rare and regular sights. And yet she was happy in her way. Her wants were limited to her possibilities by habitual self-denial. There was only one single wish that she never got over. Hear what she says—talking to herself—"When the minister's prayin' for widders and orphans he'd better make mention of one more, and that's women without front winders!"

Yes, the lack of a front window was a constant source of grief to her.

Well, now, the point and the pathos of this story is that this "Honest Soul" making a quilt each for two different neighbours, out of clippings which each had supplied, found, on finishing them and folding up the leavings to return to each, that somehow, to her utter dismay, she had apparently used some wrong pieces in each of the quilts.

She had toiled steadily on the patch-work quilts. At the end of a fortnight they were nearly completed. She had hurried on with the last, one morning, thinking that she would carry them both to their owners that afternoon and get her pay. Then came that sickening discovery. What did she do? What think you? The poor old soul stood staring at the quilts in piti-ful dismay. "A hull fortin't's work!" she muttered. "What shall I do? Miss Bliss [the owner of one quilt] will be mad. . . . She won't say nothin' and she'll pay me, but she'll feel it inside, and it won't be doing the square thing by her. No; if I'm to earn money, I'll earn it."

Martha gave her head a jerk. The spirit which animated her father, when he went to housekeeping with a piece of a house without any front window, blazed up within her. She made herself a cup of tea, then sat deliberately down by the window to rip the quilts to pieces. It had to be pretty thoroughly done; the wrong calicoes had got into so many squares. "I wish I had a front winder to set to while I'm doin' on't," said she, as she patiently plied her scissors till dusk.

And how for the next fortnight she did it, and what came of it, and how she kept on at it to the point of positive starvation, and how it all ended, and how she got even a "front winder" after all—you should read in Mary Wilkins's own words, whose own words and art and genius are all needed to tell of this "Honest Soul" as she really deserves.

HOW TO HELP THE CAUSE OF PEACE.

PREACHING at the Old Meeting House, Mansfield, on "Peace" Sunday, the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., made the following suggestions to those "who wished to break a lance in the cause of human brotherhood and love." At the close of the service a memorial in favour of the Tsar's Rescript was extensively signed by members of the congregation.

(1.) Don't encourage a false and selfish patriotism, and never hesitate to denounce "Jingoism" and all its works.

(2.) Don't encourage the too common cant about "the strong man armed," which is simply a gospel of provocation and defiance.

(3.) Don't give currency to the old fallacy that "trade follows the flag." Lord Farrer and others have effectively disposed of this favourite Jingo plea, and have proved that trade follows, not the flag, but the price-list.

(4.) Don't receive Peace efforts with either cold water or the cold shoulder. Try and be as good as your creed.

(5.) Make yourself acquainted with the history, literature, aspirations, and good points of foreign nations—not merely with their blunders and weaknesses.

(6.) Remember the ghastly and cruel side of war, as well as its seeming "glories."

(7.) Remember that a "spirited foreign policy" means stagnation and increased taxation at home, and perhaps, ultimately, the conscription.

(8.) Remember the fate of military Empires in the past.

(9.) Remember that "peace hath her victories, no less renowned than war."

(10.) Remember that Jesus came to teach us that Right is Might. The modern statesman's doctrine that "Might is Right" is anti-Christian and atheistic.

(11.) Encourage Peace journals (such as Concord, one penny monthly), and Peace and Arbitration societies. Their arguments have now been vindicated by the world's greatest autocrat.

(12.) Most important of all—have faith in the future, which it is yours to create, and in the better mind and heart of man. Never despair of Peace, or sink into that criminal indifference and apathy which is the opportunity of the enemies of mankind. War against war bravely and well. Put on the Christian armour—the breast-plate of Righteousness, the shield of Faith, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bolton.—On New Year's Day at the special service of Recognition and Self-dedication at Bank-street Chapel, forty-four new members joined the congregation. The service was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, who preached on "A welcome into our Inheritance." In spite of losses by death, removal, &c., there has been a net gain of fifty-six in the membership during the last two years.

Chorley.—The annual tea party and sale of work took place in the schoolroom on Monday, Dec. 26. The Rev. Andrew Doel presided over the meeting, and gave a short address, while in the course of the evening's entertainment prizes were distributed to the scholars for regular attendance, &c.

Derby.—The annual school party was held on the Tuesday in Christmas week. After tea, of which over 100 partook, the Rev. J. Birks presided over an enjoyable entertainment, which concluded with a musical play, after which prizes were distributed.

Dundee.—A special New Year service in connection with the Unitarian Church Sabbath School was held on Sunday afternoon in the church. Mr. Duncan Macdonald, ex-bailie, in the course of an interesting address which was followed with perfect attention, emphasised the importance of the young basing their lives on good principles. He strongly recommended for a prosperous life the importance of integrity and perfect truthfulness. The Rev. Hy. Williamson expressed his pleasure at this visit from a member of another religious community, and hoped all churches would engage more closely in common works.

Evesham.—On Sunday, the 1st inst., the Mayor (Councillor Geoffrey New) invited the members of the Corporation to accompany him to the Morning Service at Oat-street Chapel. Nearly all the members of the Corporation, the Corporation officials, the Police Force and the Fire Brigade attended, and with a large general congregation, filled the chapel. This is believed to be the first occasion in the history of the borough on which the Corporation have in State attended divine worship elsewhere than in the parish churches. The service was conducted by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, who preached on the subject of temptation, and showed how there are temptations to nobler, higher life no less than to evil, and applied this both to business and to public life.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant wishes us to state that he has received various donations for his Poors' Purse and some parcels of clothing in response to his recent appeal, for which he expresses his gratitude. He has personally acknowledged each contribution.

Manchester: Platt Chapel.—The annual Christmas tea-party and distribution of prizes to the Sunday scholars took place on Saturday evening, Dec. 31, in The Schools, Portland-grove, Fallowfield. The Rev. C. T. Poynting had a kind word for each one who came up for a prize, and thanked the young men who so ably managed the Savings Bank accounts and the Sunday-school library. The evening was brought to a close by a well-rendered performance of A. S. Gatty's charming operetta Rumpelstiltskin. The Thrift Club, with a membership of eighty-eight, has taken over £100 during the year, and the Temperance Guild has worked hard to make the Christmas Club a success for a third year, 300 members, according to the amount they paid, having received 'tea, groceries, a ham or a goose for their Christmas dinner.

Northampton.—The New Year's Eve party was well attended. After tea the Rev. J. Byles expressed his pleasure at being present and his hope that the New Year would be prosperous to the church and all connected with it. Sir Philip Manfield also addressed the meeting at a later stage in the evening, and the meeting sent a cordial message to Lady Manfield, who was unable to be present. A very bright and spirited entertainment followed.

Pudsey.—The annual Christmas party of the Sunday-school was held on Boxing Day, when 220 sat down to tea, the number being afterwards increased to 350. Prizes for good attendance were presented to twenty-eight scholars. The annual Christmas-tree and sale of work was held on the last day of the year, and was opened by Mr. W. J. Noble, a member of the School Board, and the first Unitarian elected to that office in Pudsey. The amount realised was £20 10s. 7d.

Scarborough.—On Christmas Day the congregation resolved that the following Address should be forwarded to the Marquis of Salisbury, in reference to the Tsar's Peace Rescript:—"We, the undersigned, representing the congregation of Westborough Church (Unitarian) in the Borough of Scarborough, cordially welcome the recent Rescript of H.M. the Emperor of Russia, and thank Her Majesty's Government for the prompt acceptance of the invitation to the proposed Conference, which we earnestly hope may lead to some practical method of 'putting an end to the progressive development of the present armaments,' and may help 'to ensure to all peoples the benefits of a real and durable peace.'"

Stockport.—The Rev. B. C. Constable, responding to the general invitation of the Peace Society, observed the Sunday before Christmas as Peace Sunday, and in the morning preached a sermon, of which the Society is having 3,000 copies printed in pamphlet form. On Monday, Dec. 26, the Sunday-school held its annual Christmas party, when the audience was large, and all passed off very well.

Swansea (Presentation).—On Dec. 30 a representative gathering, including members of various philanthropic, educational, scientific, and literary societies in the town, as well as members of the congregation, came together on the occasion of a presentation to the Rev. Thos. Robinson, who has just left, after a six years' ministry, to take up work at Hale. Addresses were given by Messrs. W. B. Hughes, G. Bell, C. H. Perkins, W. W. Holmes, D. Harris, and Miss Brock—members of the congregation—and by visitors. The present, which took the form of a copy of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and an address, was cordially accepted by Mr. Robinson, who expressed his grateful appreciation of the kindness he had met with on all sides.

PSALMS OF THE WEST.

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.
"We have in this volume ninety Psalms of modern times containing innumerable beautiful sentiments."—Christian Life.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

ETHICAL RELIGION.

*The New Testament of Jesus
for Theists.*

A Compilation of Selected Passages Freely

If it is "the Personal Religion of Jesus" that we would learn; what He actually taught, and what His real Life meant—not what other men believed or declared of Him after His departure—this "reasonable quest of sacred truth" must be directed to that portion of the books in our possession, which can be relied upon as an historical record. Original written documents, fairly well attested, were available in the Apostolic age. These were, first, the reports of public discourses, heard and noted down by Matthew, who would, from the nature of his secular business, be able to write in his native language, though Peter and John, the fishermen, were at that time illiterate men; and secondly, the collection of biographical data gathered by Mark, when he served the Apostolic missions as secretary, from his conversations with men who had accompanied Jesus in Galilee. To these materials we may safely add the parables, likely to have been preserved by frequent oral repetition at Christian meetings; and a few obviously characteristic personal anecdotes.

A serious attempt, a merely tentative essay, is here ventured, to show that such probably genuine elements of the books called "the First Three" or "Synoptic Gospels"—which books, in their present form, cannot be proved to have existed before the middle, at any rate, of the Second Century—may be separated from whatever additions or interpolations should appear due to anonymous, irresponsible, literary compilers, in those composite, amplified narratives, our "Scriptures" which were subsequently adopted by the ecclesiastical canon. It will not be deemed a reprehensible intrusion. It is now submitted, but with some diffidence, only as an experiment, in the hope that more competent scholars will soon undertake this needful task. The following rules for determining the unauthenticity of passages abounding in the "Three First Gospels" are laid down by the Rev. Dr. Martineau in "The Seat of Authority in Religion" (Edition of 1890, pages 577, 593, 596, 652):—

"THE VEIL TAKEN AWAY."

"1. Wherever, during or before the ministry of Jesus, any person in the narrative is made to speak in language, or refer to events, which had their origin at a later date, the report is incredible as an anachronism.

"2. Miraculous events cannot be regarded as adequately attested, in presence of natural causes accounting for belief in their occurrence.

"3. Acts and words ascribed to Jesus, which plainly transcend the moral level of the narrators, authenticate themselves as his; while such as are out of character with his spirit, but congruous with theirs, must be referred to inaccurate tradition.

"The first of these rules compels us to treat as unauthentic, in its present form, every reputed or implied claim of Jesus to be the promised Messiah.

"While it is impossible to reach any original attestation, which we can appreciate as adequate, to substantiate the tales that would be incredible to-day, nothing is more certain than that, in the state of mind out of which the Church was born, miracles would have been freely believed, whether they had really happened or not."—(Page 593.)

"The application of our third rule, excluding what is incongruous with the personal characteristics of Jesus, is a much more difficult and delicate task for the critic than he encounters with the other two; nor will his handling of it, however cautious, bring conviction to those who require more definite grounds of belief than those afforded by harmony and disharmony in the shades of character. And yet, to those who cannot help being affected by such phenomena, there is nothing more persuasive."—(Page 596.)

"THE RELIGION PERSONALLY REALISED."

"If Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God."—(Page 652.)

PIANOFORTE MAKERS,

INVENTORS OF THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

The HIRE SYSTEM, now so widely used, was unknown until its invention, in 1846, by Messrs. Moore and Moore.

Two years ago, in the course of an important appeal case in the House of Lords, their Lordships were pleased to make commendatory remarks on the fairness, convenience, and utility of Messrs. Moore and Moore's invention.

All classes of Messrs. Moore and Moore's Pianofortes and American Organs—new or second-hand, from 18 guineas upwards to 96 guineas—are supplied on their Three Years' System, on the following easy and generous TERMS.

After 3 years' hiring at low rates, varying from £1 11s. 6d. to £8 8s. per Quarter in advance (or from 10s. 6d. to 56s. per month, as preferred), the instrument becomes the absolute property of the hirer.

The total thus paid never exceeds the price of the instrument; there are no extra charges.

Carriage free throughout the United Kingdom.

Tuning free within a radius of about 20 to 25 miles round London, and in Brighton, Hastings, Bexhill, Worthing, Southend, Chelmsford, &c., &c.

The Hirer can return the instrument at any time, or can make it his own in less than 3 years.

No deposit or guarantee is required.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE print this week some "First Impressions" of the new Evangelical Catechism. The variety they present is more than equalled by the variety of opinion among Evangelicals themselves, if we may judge by some communications to this week's Independent. Mr. Horwill, an acute and scholarly Bible Christian, expects that "this new doctrinal skeleton will be no less a bone of contention than its predecessors"; he especially condemns it as an educational instrument. Mr. Thomas Spurgeon "can only say that the Catechism is far too vague for him"; his father would probably have been able to say something more decided than that! Some, like Mr. Pierce, of Hampstead, Mr. Pearson, of Manchester, and Mr. Arnold Thomas, chairman of the Congregational Union, approve the Catechism heartily; and Dr. Barrett, of Norwich, looks upon it as a "monument of the unity of the evangelical faith." On the other hand, Mr. Griffith Jones, of Balham, dreads lest it be made a fetter for the thought of the Churches; Mr. Welsh, of Brondesbury, thinks the true test of the Catechism—to him "more than satisfactory"—will be what the young people make of it; and Mr. Aked, of Liverpool, says "the Free Church part of the Catechism is magnificent, but the theological part valueless." He does not think it was worth doing at all.

DR. MARTINEAU visited Essex Hall on Wednesday, accompanied by his eldest daughter, to pay his subscription as a member of the B. and F.U. Association. He apologised for being late with his subscription, which, seeing that it was only due on New Year's day, was not very late, after all. Perhaps some of his juniors may be stimulated not to lag behind this example of business punctuality; his seniors may be let off a little longer. In a brief conversation on the subject of the new Evangelical Catechism, Dr. Martineau expressed himself as naturally gratified with the evident changes for the better which it exhibits, but he thought the compilers, having gone so far, would have to go farther. In particular they would not be able to rest at the point of securing a creed accurately corresponding to the Bible as it stands. Their studies must at last convince them that behind the letter of the record there was the problem of the complex thoughts and opposing tendencies out of which the scripture itself took shape; and the more this problem was realised the more clearly the paramount claims of reason and conscience would assert themselves.

MORITZ VON EGIDY, who died on December 29, at the age of fifty-one, was formerly lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of hussars in Saxony. In 1890, while still in the army, he published his "Serious Thoughts," a plea for radical reform in religion, free from dogma, and true to the highest ideal of humanity. The book caused great excitement at the time, and Egidy, who is sometimes called the German Tolstoi, left the army and established himself in Berlin as the apostle of a new religious movement. He was a man of commanding nature and fervid enthusiasm. Latterly he had thrown himself earnestly into the Peace Movement, and at the time of his death was engaged in a lecturing tour in South Germany in support of the Tsar's manifesto.

To all who know anything of the strength of caste in India there is something specially interesting in an event which occurred on December 2, at Madras. This was the marriage of Mr. M. G. Naidu, M.B.(Edin.) and Miss S. Chattopādhyāya, the daughter of a doctor at Hyderabad, and also, like her husband, a former student in this country. The bride is of Brahman descent and a Bengali; the bridegroom belongs to the Balija caste—which, of course, ranks below the Brahman—and is a Madras. Our Indian contemporaries speak of the event as unique, so far, in Southern India, and as marking an epoch in the history of the reform movement which strives, against enormous odds, to break down the barriers of caste. We understand that a great deal of family and social pressure was used to prevent the marriage, and dark hints of future dangers are heard of. We hope, rather, that the brave reformers will reap an added joy in their wedded lives from the reflection that they have set a good example to their caste-bound brothers and sisters. We hear that a considerable variety of castes was also represented at the meal which followed the ceremony. Among the guests was the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. Some of our readers will remember Miss Chattopādhyāya as a student at Channing House School.

WE referred last week to several of the Twentieth Century Funds now being raised by the Wesleyan and other Bodies. A correspondent moots the point whether such a fund might not be raised amongst our churches, but he does so with some diffidence which arises from two considerations. First, there is already a project on foot for a great bazaar in London, with which such a scheme might interfere; and secondly, would a large permanent fund, say of £100,000, be a blessing or a curse to our movement? As to the latter it is probable that some of our readers would very much like to try before giving their verdict. As to the London project, there is an opinion in certain quarters that a national Church Loan Building Fund would be preferable to a metropolitan one; and if the scheme took this turn it would be carrying out a proposal long ago presented to the Triennial Conference by Mr. Worthington. Our correspondent suggests imitating the Wesleyan mode of raising the fund by guinea subscriptions from all the members (and servants, if practicable) of all our families—the subscriptions to be given or collected before January 1, 1901. We mention the matter with a view to eliciting opinion. Clearly what is to be done by way of organising should be done promptly.

Det glade Budskab is the title of a little sixteen-page magazine, the first number of which was published on New Year's Day, by Mr. Theo. Berg, at Copenhagen. On Mr. Berg's initiative some lectures on Liberal religion were recently delivered in that city by Kristopher Janson, of Christiania, and the issue of this little paper of "glad tidings" is intended to see what further response there may be to the message. It is proposed to issue Det glade Budskab twice a month. The first number opens with a translation of Miss Havergal's hymn, "Speak to me, Lord, that I may speak." Then follows a translation of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's, "Ideals of Unitarians," and the Rev. W. C. Bowie's "Liberal Christianity," and a concluding article by the Editor, on "Faith, Hope, Love—these three," which is the motto chosen by Mr. Berg for his brave little messenger. God speed to him!

WHILE Dr. Fairbairn was in Calcutta delivering his Haskell lectures, a reception was given to him by the Brahmo Somaj Committee in their Library. Dr. Fairbairn was received by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, Secretary of the Committee, who spoke some cordial words of welcome, and was then "garlanded" in Oriental fashion. Referring to Dr. Fairbairn's lectures, the Indian Messenger says of the first four of the six that they might have been delivered from the pulpit of the Brahmo Somaj.

In refuting the arguments of materialists, utilitarians and pessimists, he stood on ground which is common to all believers. It is considered fashionable now-a-days by many of our young men who have received English education to be sceptics. To this class the foundations of faith should be presented in a philosophical way. It should be shown to them that the First Cause of the universe cannot be other than Mind, that the moral sentiment is too profound for the formula of utilitarianism, and that man's aspiration after righteousness, and his realisation of the sanctity of love, are themselves a proof that the ends of life are beneficent. Whoever addresses himself to the task of elucidating these fundamental truths is a co-worker with us. And we are therefore grateful for Principal Fairbairn's work here, not simply because in him we had an opportunity of seeing a distinguished representative of modern culture, but because in most of his lectures he dealt with questions in which his principles and ours are the same. Dr. Fairbairn is a liberal Christian, and we are glad that he devoted more of his time to the vindication of natural theism against its assailants than to the exposition of the distinctive dogmas of Christianity. Though there are differences of principle between us and even the most broad-minded of the adherents of Christianity on certain points, yet we cannot but express our cordial appreciation of the wholesome influence which such workers are likely to exert on those who come in contact with them by their moral earnestness and their liberal spirit.

WE may be allowed to congratulate the Editors of Le Progrès religieux of Geneva on the completion of the first year of their undertaking. In an address to their readers on New Year's Eve they speak with courage and hopefulness of the cause of liberal religious faith to which they are devoted. Not in one year, nor in many years, can their work be accomplished, for "the price of freedom is perpetual vigilance"; but they have at least established an organ for the liberal party in the National Protestant Church. And it seems that in the New Year there will be need of redoubled efforts if the broader spirit of Catholic inclusiveness is to be maintained in the Church in Geneva, for an "Evangelical Union" is being advocated, the promoters of which declare that the National Church is Christian only in name, and aim at disestablishment in order that they may secure the Church on a dogmatic "Evangelical" basis.

MANY good words for the New Year have reached us. The sermon "What is Your Life?" preached by the Rev. Frank Walters on the evening of Christmas Day in the Church of the Divine Unity at Newcastle, looks forward as well as back, with quiet faith and hopefulness. The Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in the Mill Hill Pulpit for January is "The Surcease of Time: A New Year's Day Sermon." The New Year's address of the Rev. John Byles to the members of the Kettering-road Church, Northampton, contains the following appeal, which we may make in his words to members of other congregations:—

At the beginning of the year, as a congregation we naturally turn ourselves to the future.

May I bring one point especially before you. I am very wishful that our morning service—week after week—should prove itself a helping and uplifting power. There is about the morning gathering a freshness and a quietude not always found at a later period of the day. I am anxious we should use it to the best advantage. There are always in our midst the troubled who need comfort; the weary who need rest; the tempted who need strength; the perplexed who look for guidance. There are the old who ought to be cheered, and the young who wait to be touched and quickened and inspired. My desire is that all these should find in our morning service the help they need. I want them all to feel its power.

To secure this end I need your help. Power is contagious; and the constant, punctual, unflinching attendance of sympathetic worshippers and of those who in their hearts are earnestly desiring the highest blessings, alike for themselves and their children, and their fellow-worshippers must of necessity react and make itself felt—first in the heart of him who leads the worship, and secondly in the hearts of those who have met together. I would have each one of you to remember that the interest and the value and the power of the service depend, not on the minister alone, but on all those of whom the congregation is—or ought to be—composed. May I therefore affectionately urge upon you, so far as it is possible, to regard it as an obligation to be in your place at the morning service. Come yourselves and bring your children.

Suffer, I pray you, this word of exhortation.

A SIMILAR appeal was made by the Rev. S. Farrington to the members of the Richmond Free Church:—

OUR COMMON WORSHIP.—This is indeed the prime and fundamental object of our association here. They who have felt the power of their worship to enlarge—to uplift—to strengthen the soul, know that nothing can ever be a substitute for it. How often it happens to us that in seeking to realise a so-called freedom, we drop the very stays and supports we most need; and ceasing to feel our common worship a duty, we soon cease to feel it a delight. Our sense of worship and our sense of God alike decay.

I am often asked: "What can I do to promote our Church success?" The answer is very simple—"Be in your place every Sunday morning as certainly as you are at your business every Monday morning; and do not let any excuse serve for the one which would not be good for the other." There is nothing you can do so useful as this. There is no means of helping our Church—of "fulfilling" it—so simple—so within everyone's reach—and yet so effectual. Your personality is wanted. Your presence is wanted more than anything else. It will be a Happy and Hopeful Year for the Church if more of us try thus to help.

THE PLEA FOR A MANUAL.

SIR,—Mr. Squire has not caught my meaning, nor, I think, the meaning of the expression which he criticised for its unreality. As this expression occurs in a manual which is more used in our churches than any other, perhaps a plea for it will not be denied. The phrase occurs in the ninth service of "Common Prayer for Christian Worship," this ninth service being one of the two new services which, according to the preface now added—"With a view to reach more effectually some chords of modern feeling." The prayer in which the passage appears is a confession of sin—"Holy Lord God; how can we lift up our face, and make mention of Thy lovingkindness? for Thy praise is only our abasement, and the greatness of Thy mercy is the measure of our guilt." Now I do not, as Mr. Squire supposes, think that this passage means "that however great the guilt, the mercy will not be less." It is not an expression of trust, but a statement of fact, and I think it means that God's great mercy in pardoning our guilt, and continuing His lovingkindness to us, cannot be extolled without abasement in the thought that our guilt should have required such abundant mercy.

To require so much mercy the guilt must have been proportionately great, the mercy applied, in this sense, measuring the guilt to which it is applied.

Mr. Squire's supposition that any manual would have forms for the special occasions to which I referred is hardly justified by the manuals at present in use. With the exception of "Common Prayer for Christian Worship," I do not know of one which contains services for baptism, weddings, and funerals.

Newport, I.W. CLEMENT E. PIKE.

"THE OPEN BROTHERHOOD."

SIR,—As a conductor of a Postal Mission correspondence, I come in contact with many orthodox minds, and I am struck with the vague and unpractical views which appear on page 855 of THE INQUIRER of December 31, as to the best means of spreading the teachings of Christ as held by Unitarian Christians. To call ourselves Christians only is invidious; to call ourselves Presbyterians in England is untrue and misleading. The denial that Christ is an object of worship marks us as Unitarians, the worshippers of one God, yet that we are neither Jews nor Theists, for Unitarian Christians reverence Christ's teachings and the lessons of his life.

January 2. J. M. LEE.

[We are not surprised that a Postal Mission worker should find no guidance in the advertisement to which Miss Lee refers, for the clearing up of theological difficulties. It aims rather, so far as we understand its purport, at an ideal religious fellowship in which all theological differences shall be forgotten. With regard to the last sentence of Miss Lee's letter, it should be noted that many enlightened Jews "reverence Christ's teachings and the lessons of his life," and that all Christians, whether Unitarian or Trinitarian, are Theists.—ED. INQ.]

ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—As sundry subscriptions to the above have from force of habit come to me, will you kindly allow me to say that our present hon. treasurer is Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., 43, Queen's-gardens, Ilford, Essex? And may I at the same time remind our friends and the secretaries of our affiliated societies that it will save Mr. Edwards both trouble and expense if they will kindly send him their subscriptions without waiting to be asked?

LITERATURE.

R. W. DALE.*

THERE can be no doubt that Dr. Dale was one of the most interesting personalities English Nonconformity ever produced. Wherever he went, in whatever company he was found, men could not but be impressed by his vivid speech, his strenuous purpose, his force of character, and a certain air and bearing of unaffected manliness. A born gladiator, he was engaged in many controversies, and perhaps it would be too much to say that he never made an enemy, although there never was a more chivalrous opponent nor one more anxious to do full justice to the other side of the case. Being what he was—strong, impetuous, and forceful—he could not help giving many a thrust which wounded deep at the time, yet in the long run the very men whom he had worsted and trampled on in the fight came to respect and honour him as a high-minded Englishman, and an opponent who never forgot that he was a Christian, devoted with conspicuous unselfishness to the public welfare and the service of the Church. He was a good hater, especially of gush and sentimentality, of shams and humbugs. He was yet more conspicuously a loyal friend, trusted and loved even when conscience compelled him to break old associations and stand in opposition to those who had once been his comrades in arms. The first impression one receives from his biography is of—

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better.
Like Browning, he might ask, "What had I to do with the slothful, with the mawkish, with the unmanly?" He drove his way on to the ends he had in view with a vigour which sometimes swept all before him like an irresistible tide.

Sons, as a rule, are not ideal biographers of their fathers; but in this case the work has been done with tact and discrimination, and without the assumption that there are no flaws in the marble, which sons are too apt to consider the note of filial piety. Mr. Dale has worked with material which did not easily lend itself to artistic treatment, and a good deal of which is of denominational rather than public interest; yet he has succeeded in weaving a narrative at once simple and picturesque, full of interest to those who themselves have lived through the period and its controversies in which Dale of Birmingham played so prominent a part. In one respect there are some who will find the picture deficient. It scarcely gives an adequate idea of the high spirits, gaiety, lilt, and abounding vitality of the man in his prime. On the other hand, the note of sadness which undoubtedly tinged his later years, is too prominent. There were great breadths of sunshine between the clouds.

Perhaps it was inevitable that a life of Dale should be largely taken up with the exposition of Congregational principles. Congregationalism was to Dale a faith and a passion, although at times he found himself strangely at variance with his brethren as to its interpretation and development. Congregationalism is not to-day what it was fifty years ago, and the change is largely due to the influence of Dale. From one point of view his biography may be called "A Manual of the New Congregationalism," and in that respect will appeal to a very limited public. But to the devout and affectionate student of the history of religious thought, with whom the growth of ideas and institutions is a life-long interest, this book will have its special value. Dale gave the good ship Congregationalism a new direction. He protested against the democratic individualism which set the Congregational churches in isolation and apart. He laboured to impress on them the corporate idea of church life. He used language about the "supernatural" endowments of the ministry, and the "supernatural" powers and authority of the Church, which, while it startled many of his Congregationalist friends almost out of their five wits, made high churchmen exclaim, "What a leader we might have had in Dale had only his early environment been different!" His opposition to the Zwinglian theory of the Sacraments as symbols and memorials in favour of the view that they are the appointed channels of a real communication of grace caused no little stir, the echoes of which have not yet passed away. It was supposed that because he moved, he must necessarily move in the direction of a more liberal theology, and in quarters not a few he was spoken of as a Broad Churchman. No mistake could have been greater. Usually of broad sympathies, the one class of man he failed to get into touch with was the Broad Churchman. The temper, tone, attitude and outlook of men like Dean Stanley and F. D. Maurice he never understood and therefore never appreciated. He did much to check the Broad Church movement in Nonconformity. From first to last he emphasised the necessity of preaching dogma. To the end of his days he was the most distinguished champion of Evangelical theology Nonconformity possessed. While accepting the conclusions of Science, while refusing to shut his eyes to the inroads of criticism on the popular view of the Bible, he gave for many a new lease of life to Evangelical dogma by restating its terms. No one saw more clearly than he that Science had knocked the bottom out of the narrative of the Fall considered as history, and that criticism had destroyed the doctrine of plenary inspiration. A theology which had made these things its foundation-stones must find a new basis if the whole superstructure was not to come tumbling down. Dale imagined he had discovered that new basis in the universal Christian Consciousness. He appealed to experience and the history of the Church. He failed to see that his new discovery was simply the old maxim of the Roman Catholic Church—Quod semper, quod ubique, et quod ab omnibus.

But Dale's was a life of many interests—a Theologian, a Politician, a Preacher, a Pamphleteer. A man of affairs, shrewd in council, practical and swift in action, he filled many posts, and adorned them all with an eloquence and a moral purpose which did much to inspire his associates with the enthusiasm that leads to success. His was a clear, logical mind: he had the rare power of reasoning out a great argument before a popular audience. His mind was reflected in a literary style admirable for its lucidity, order and precision. He had made a careful study of the great French preachers, and his own preaching and literary efforts betrayed the influence of some of the best features of French oratory and literature. His was a Latin rather than a Teutonic mind. He was fond of quoting the Frenchman who said that if a thing cannot be clearly expressed it is not worth expressing at all. To be definite, precise, logical, is a great height of virtue, and when to this is added a certain brilliance of language the effect is powerful. But the lack of tenderness and pathos in his preaching was also reflected in a style which, while clear and brilliant, was hard as polished steel.

In more ways than one Dale was aware of his own defects. His preaching, while it powerfully moved the minds of the thoughtful, was not calculated to do the simple evangelistic work which he saw flourishing greatly under the labours of men of much inferior intellectual endowment. He greatly desired to succeed here, as well as in the defence and exposition of doctrine, and his comparative failure accounts for that prostration of himself before Mr. Moody and his unbounded admiration for the American evangelist, which so astonished many of his friends. Dale would have given worlds for Moody's secret of touching the human heart.

It was in other directions that Dale did his best work. Impressed as he was with its necessity, perhaps he himself did not see how grand a thing he accomplished in inspiring Evangelicalism with a passion for ethics. He had the courage to point out that the Evangelical Revival of the last century, in which Methodism was born, and which largely revolutionised the Congregational Churches, was especially defective in ethical directions. Too little thought had been given to character and conduct. The concentration of effort upon saving the soul, the importance of conversion, the necessity of faith, had dwarfed the at least equal importance of moral training and development. To discipline and perfect the moral life along Christian lines was the task to which he summoned the Evangelical Churches. Here is a striking passage from a sermon on the "Evangelical Revival":—

As yet, however, the Evangelical Revival has done very little to give us a nobler and more Christian ideal of practical life. It has been very timid. It has shrunk from politics. It has regarded literature and art with a certain measure of mistrust. In business it has been content with attaching Divine sanction to recognised virtues. We are living in a new world, and Evangelicals do not seem to have discovered it. The immense development of manufacturing industries, the wider separation of classes in great towns—a separation produced by the increase of commercial wealth—the new relations which have grown up between the employers and the employed, the spread of popular education, the growth of a vast popular literature, the increased political power of the masses of the people, the gradual decay of the old aristocratic organisation of society, and the advance in many forms of the spirit of democracy—have urgently demanded fresh applications of the eternal ideas of the Christian faith to conduct. But Evangelical Christians have hardly touched the new ethical problems which have come with the new time.

It was Dale's glory to have been largely instrumental in rousing the Evangelical Churches to the necessity of extending the range and ennobling the authority of conscience.

* "The Life of R. W. Dale, of Birmingham." By his son, A. W. Dale. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

This larger and nobler morality took practical shape in the appeal he made to men of wealth, position, leaders in the church, and leaders in society, to come forward and take their share in the conduct of municipal affairs and the purification of public life. He proclaimed in season and out of season that men might serve Christ in the polling booth, in the Town Council, or on the School Board, just as truly as in the Church meeting or the Sunday-school. He would never allow that concern for the soul could excuse a man from public duty. For Birmingham he preached a municipal Gospel. It is true he was not the first in the field. For years George Dawson had been teaching that unless the best and ablest men in a community were willing to serve, new laws could not work any great reformation; that it was the duty of those who derived their prosperity and opportunities of culture from the community to become its servants. Mr. Dawson was, in fact, the prophet of the new movement. But Mr. Dawson, while a more persuasive speaker than Dale, had not Dale's business and organising faculty nor his tremendous energy. It was Dale who carried the fiery torch through the wards of the town. He was soon joined by two other well-known ministers—Charles Vince and Dr. Crosskey. At the same moment Mr. Joseph Chamberlain entered the field, bringing with him powerful resources both in men and money. These men, taught by Dawson, Dale, Vince, and Crosskey, came to conceive of their town as a being with its own capacities and responsibilities, to dream for it glorious dreams, to labour for its welfare and good government with the ardour of a lover for his mistress. "They spoke of sweeping away streets in which it was not possible for people to live a healthy and decent life; of making the town sweeter, cleaner, and brighter; of providing gardens, and parks, and music; of erecting baths and free libraries, an art gallery and a museum"; of municipalising great monopolies, such as gas and water; of schools and colleges for the people; of making the town a thing of pride for its citizens, as men were once proud of Florence and Venice. They were the pioneers of that municipal reform which has spread throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. And in this great work Dale, by his courage, sagacity, and earnestness, took a most conspicuous part, which his fellow-townsmen were not slow to acknowledge.

It is impossible in a short review like this to speak of all Dale's public labours, of his membership of the School Board, and his work on the Royal Commission on Elementary Education; of his Dis-establishment campaign with his friend Rogers; of his services on Hospital and College committees. He "toiled terribly," often in his prime working sixteen hours a day, and always with an intensity which, while it burnt like a torch, burnt up his vital energy. He paid the penalty of over-exertion in frequent illnesses and a premature death. His last years were unhappily darkened by many sorrows, not the least of which was his estrangement from many of his old colleagues arising out of the Irish controversy. But when he died all animosities were forgotten, and men of all parties, schools, and creeds joined together to render honour to his worth and work. A strenuous politician, a staunch Nonconformist, a passionate Evangelical, he yet had friends in every camp, and Conservatives as well as Liberals, High Churchmen and Low Churchmen, Unitarians and Methodists, joined with Congregationalists in lamenting the passing away of one who had served his generation so well, and had paid the debt of ministry, which every man owes to the world and age in which he lives, to the very last farthing.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Structure of Life. By Mrs. W. A. Burke.—"This little book deals with the make and the making of ourselves. It is a meditation pointed by keen sayings of wise men and women, upon what we are, and what we may be, if we live according to our best knowledge. The weightiest moral teaching has always thrown itself into the form of aphorisms, maxims, verse, rhythm, and metaphor. It cannot fail to be, in a large measure, quotation." These opening words from the preface serve very fairly and faithfully to represent its scope and contents. It is very largely indeed quotation, but none the less wise, thoughtful, and inspiring on that account. The meditations are based on the natural order of things in the structural growth of character. They cause us to reflect first upon our parentage, home life, and antecedents. We then follow life's growth through youth to manhood, and all the way through the supreme emphasis is laid on the importance of the small things of everyday life, it is of these that character is built up. The book is well printed and pleasant to read, and the reading of it may be recommended to the young and to those who desire a short moral text-book on "The Structure of Life." The Scowcroft Critics. By John Ackworth.—A collection of stories and character studies of Lancashire villagers. A silent, rugged, great-hearted, tender-hearted folk, with sharp tongues and sarcastic humours. The first story gives the title to the book. The critics are the elders of a Methodist chapel. The story pictures the unlovely side of some dissent, the critical spirit, the lack of humility, the poverty in real worship of the hearers, and the "high falutin'" vocabulary of the preacher who has little to say and says it in many words. But the subject of the first story should drive no reader from the book. For, if in one or two of the other stories the author does occasionally dangerously approach burlesque, in the main the book is excellent. Every reader will, when he finishes the book, have learnt to love many of the men and women that live in its pages, and be the better for time spent with them. (James Clarke and Co. 3s. 6d.)

Scribner's Magazine begins this month the publication of a series of letters by the late R. L. Stevenson, to be continued during the whole or the greater part of the year. The letters are edited by Mr. Sidney Colvin, who is preparing the authorised biography of Stevenson, and are a foretaste of that work. In the present number the letters are of the years 1868 and 1869, and are accompanied by illustrations of the Scottish scenes described.

G. F. WATTS, R.A.—I.

No man ever devoted himself to the artistic expression of the spiritual more heartily than Mr. Watts. Not that he has neglected the painter's technique for the sake of religious ideas. He has consummate skill and spares no pains in making his pictures as perfect as possible; yet this is always subservient to the lesson he desires to teach by his painting.

His lofty ideals of Art were formed when he was quite a youth, but in old age they are as prominent in his thought as when he was barely out of his teens. He was born in 1817, and in November of 1896 he said to the writer, "I shall be eighty in February, and I mean to do my best work yet."

The life work of Mr. Watts naturally falls into three groups. The first consists chiefly of historical composition, the Westminster competitions, and the portraits he painted at Florence; the second his gallery of contemporary celebrities, and the third his beautiful series of paintings of spiritual ideas. The first were merely youthful productions, but in painting them he learnt the necessity of being free from the dictates of patrons, if he was to work in the direction indicated by his own soul. He was fortunate enough to secure such freedom. He won a prize for a Westminster cartoon, and went to Florence, where his portrait commissions were many and well paid. He earned enough money in these few years to allow him to devote the rest of his life to work of an ideal character.

The great lesson he had learnt from his contact with society was that the majority of people neglect the highest and best of life for the superficial and the untrue. He had gained power with his brush, and he was determined to show by that means what was his conception of true life.

To carry out this purpose he set himself to do two things. First, he would make a selection of the people he considered the noblest of his time, and endeavour to get their permission to paint their portraits. If he was able to form anything like a good collection he would present the gallery to the nation. And, secondly, he would endeavour to put on canvas the highest and purest conceptions of life and conduct. Notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of such gigantic undertakings he has succeeded in both. His wonderful series of character delineations of Tennyson, Browning, Carlyle, Matthew Arnold, Martineau, Morris, Gladstone, Meredith, and others have gained world-wide popularity, and his collection of ideal life subjects is without parallel in the world's history. This series was also intended for the nation, and many of the paintings are now upon the walls of the Tate Gallery. From these we gather his religious message to our time. They form a series of noble commentaries on various phases of life, and arrange themselves easily to form a connected whole, so thoroughly has the artist worked out his philosophy of life by design and paint.

The great temptation for the individual is to consider his powers too slight for the work of life. His environment and apparently opposing circumstances are overwhelming. Mr. Watts has devoted much time during eight years to combat this delusion. As occasion permitted he has been building up a great statue called "Energy." It represents an athlete riding a powerful and highly-strung steed. No poor half-fed creature is this horse, warranted not to kick or bite, but a fully-developed and high-spirited animal, exceedingly difficult to manage.

It is the artist's emblem of Difficulty—his figure of the things which worry and seem obstacles to the proper development of the best within us. The rider has had no easy task, but he has succeeded. Throwing all weights and hindrances away, he has given himself whole-heartedly to the work in hand, has mounted the horse, holds him tightly by the reins, and is master of the situation. But, he is not satisfied. With the hand at liberty he is shading his eyes from the sun, scanning the horizon for fresh difficulties to conquer. Such is the attitude Mr. Watts would have every person present to the innumerable difficulties with which life is strewn. His answer to our cry of weakness is that we are all athletes, with a divine principle within each of us sufficient for any and every emergency.

The difficulties thus vaguely hinted at have been considered in detail by the artist and his conceptions of them made vivid on his canvas. In this series we are brought face to face with an important artistic problem.

It would not do to represent such ideas as "Greed," "Mammon," "Lust," by any beautiful figure; but, would it be correct to paint, and so perpetuate ugly forms? Mr. Watts is sure our people have to learn to detest such things, and he does not, therefore, hesitate to make them repulsive. Take, for instance, his "Mammon." Jesus assumes this spirit to be the opposite of God. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." While we admit this in a general way, it is not really believed, for most people are content to think it a blessing—bestowing power and worship at its shrine. Mr. Watts tears away the veil from the brute god in order that we may see it in its naked deformity.

In the picture we have a great bloated body wrapped in an ample but ill-fitting cloak of gold, seated upon a throne which consists partly of the bones of its victim. Its face is coarse, and powerful as an ox, and as grovelling as a toad. A crown of gold looks very much out of place on its brow. On one side a delicate girl is kneeling with her bent head upon the god's lap. Her courage, hope, and life seem to have vanished, and she is simply a slave to this monster, who holds her head down with his horrid hand. On the other side a stalwart young man lies prostrate on the ground with the monster's foot upon his neck. So the artist teaches that the spirit which prompts to money-getting and hoarding is not a bestower of blessing, but a dreadful tyrant, who robs his devotees of their nobility and life, and spreads misery and degradation around. The youth and maiden grow up beneath his power, but are unconscious that they are forfeiting the best of life.

In the same category such pictures as "Minotaur," "Cain," "Jonah," and "For he had great possessions" should be mentioned. But we have no space to deal with them. "Peace and Goodwill" is also of this series, though the title would not say as much. "Peace" is a royal lady dethroned and driven from the cities of the world, and "Goodwill" is her little outcast son. Christ was said to bring Peace and Goodwill to men, but the world has not received them. Peace is footsore and weary; she has wandered over the world in vain to find a home, and rests sorrowfully in a little out-of-the-way nook. Her feet are swollen and bandaged, and her spray of olive is withering and drooping in her hand. Her eyes wander back along the path she has come and she sees in the distance the cities still smoking, because of the strife, hatred, and cruelty which reign there.

These and such like considerations compel us to feel life's tasks are more than we can manage. The work that needs doing in the world is greater than poor humanity seems capable of accomplishing, and the individual is often ready to despair. Our artist has painted his message to such. A melancholy girl is seated on a globe which floats on the ocean of Time. To her vision there is no one else in the world. She tries to get harmony from her harp with broken strings. Her head droops and her eyes are bandaged, so she cannot see the one star which shines brightly above her. For a picture of desolation and hopelessness there is nothing I know of to equal this, and yet the artist calls it "Hope." Should it not be "Hopeless"? Many would say yes, but Mr. Watts insists by this picture that there is no case possible so bereft of joy, so low in the scale of blessing, or so apparently incapable of doing the necessary work, but there is to be found in it somewhere ample reason for Hope.

Despair was never yet so deep,
In sinking as in seeming,
Despair is hope just dropped asleep
For better chance of dreaming.

Upon one of the greatest fears which haunt humanity, Mr. Watts has spent considerable time, thought, and energy. He has tried very earnestly to remove the dread which still is associated with the idea of Death, notwithstanding the fact that we have been taught that it has been conquered, and its sting plucked. He has represented Death in many phases, but never suggesting the horror or terror which surrounds the gaunt skeleton figures of the Nightingale tomb in Westminster Abbey, or the cartoons of Albert Dürer. The figures of Death in the pictures of Mr. Watts are all majestic, kindly, tender and beautiful. Death comes as a friend with a message of peace and reward, not as an enemy with poisoned arrow.

In one called "Death the Messenger" we get a worker who is too tired to work longer, so has put away his tools, books, and scientific instruments. He is wearily resting even from those things which have interested and fascinated him for so long. The messenger steps up to him with a present in his hands and calls him away—the present is a little child, the emblem of the new life to be bestowed in exchange for the worn and weak body now fit for nothing; so Life is found in the lap of Death. In the far distance of the picture there are the misty forms of an Egyptian pyramid and a Grecian temple—a hint to the spectators that the world's progress has been through submission to the process of death. Empires and civilisations, as individuals, have lived their lives, and when their work was done, have died, to give place to newer and better things. So our life with its fulness of work is shown to be paying its contribution to the great world movement upwards. Every act, however small, every life, however insignificant, as well as every nation, however great, contributes its influence to the making of perfect humanity.

The "Nursing Mother" is a beautiful and tender picture. A winged womanly figure, with all the characteristics of a loving mother, is bending over a little child gently soothing its pale forehead, hushing it to sleep. This is Death as a nursing mother lulling earthly life to rest.

But death is inevitable. Lest we should forget this in our higher thoughts about it, our artist has painted "Love and Death." The scene is a great door—the door of earthly home life. Death as a majestic figure with inexorable tread is about to enter. The winged boy Love in agony bars the way. He soon finds such an endeavour is useless, and his wings are broken against the door he is trying to guard. The flowers of family happiness droop as the solemn figure passes, and the little dove is mourning in the corner. You do not see Death's face, but a beautiful silvery light is falling down from heaven upon her form. Her face is in dark shadow, and it is only when she has passed that we see the light upon her doings.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH- EASTERN COUNTIES.

THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

THE adjourned meeting for the further consideration of the suggested By-laws as to the Advisory Committee was held at Essex Hall, on Tuesday. The chair was taken at half-past two by the President, Mr. GEORGE W. CHITTY, and there were also present the Revs. Dr. Drummond, J. Estlin Carpenter, W. Copeland Bowie, H. Rylett, J. Harwood, H. W. Perris, A. Farquharson, W. C. Pope, H. Rawlings, G. Carter, T. E. M. Edwards, W. G. Tarrant, L. Jenkins Jones, W. G. Cadman, R. C. Dendy, J. B. Barnhill, Felix Taylor, Hubert Clarke, S. Farrington, S. G. Preston, V. D. Davis, and F. Allen (Secretary); Dr. Blake Odgers, Mr. Walter Baily (Treasurer), Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. J. Ellis Mace, Mr. Howard Young, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Mrs. Crocker, Mrs. Rylett, Mrs. W. G. Mace, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, Mrs. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. Alfred Wilson, Mr. A. Bakewell, Mrs. Farquharson, Miss H. Busk, Mr. J. A. Jenkinson, Mr. J. Evans, Mrs. Hawkins, Miss Haylock, Mrs. Cadman, Mr. J. Hooper, Mr. A. Bland, Mrs. Suffield, Mrs. O. A. Shrubsole, Mr. A. Madocks, Mr. F. W. Ruck, Mrs. Farrington, Miss Blatch, Mr. E. L. Buckland, and Mr. E. Capleton.

In the course of the meeting, the President read a letter he had received from Mr. J. H. Every, one of the Lewes delegates, who was unable to be present, but expressed his approval of the appointment of a representative Committee, the need of which they had felt at Lewes, even before the inauguration of the Assembly. Dr. Blake Odgers also read a letter he had received from Dr. Brooke Herford, as follows:—

As I know you have been specially interested in settling the "Advisory Committee" question, on a permanent and useful basis, I wish to say to you (and you are free to make any use you like of this letter) that I think the settlement, suggested by the Committee, in their circular summoning the adjourned meeting of the Assembly, to be about the best that under the circumstances could be made. The real guarantee of the Advisory Committee's usefulness is its personnel—and the names suggested ought, I think, to satisfy all. I cannot be present, but am glad to coincide with what is proposed.

The PRESIDENT, in opening the meeting, called upon the SECRETARY, who read the resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Assembly at Dover, on October 4, affirming "That it is desirable that an Advisory Committee should be appointed" (passed by 57 votes to 26), and the further resolution adjourning the consideration of the suggested By-laws. The By-laws were then considered seriatim and adopted in the following form, which was the form suggested by the Committee, except that in 2 (b) affecting was substituted for between. The defining of the number of the Committee in I had been added since the meeting at Dover.

BY-LAWS.

1.—An Advisory Committee shall be appointed at each Annual Meeting of the Assembly and shall consist of five members—namely, the President for the time being, two ministers and two laymen.

2.—The duties of the Advisory Committee shall be:—

(a) On request to advise any congregation in the Province on any question affecting its welfare as a congregation; also to advise the minister or other officer of such a congregation, and the trustee of any building or endowment in which any such congregation is interested, who may seek advice as to his rights or duties as such minister, officer, or trustee.

(b) At the request of all parties concerned, to act as arbitrator or mediator, or to appoint an arbitrator or mediator to act, in any dispute which may have arisen affecting such a congregation, minister, officer, trustee, or any of them.

(c) On the application of any person desiring to enter the ministry in any part of the Province, to examine into his character and personal fitness, but not into his doctrinal belief.

3.—Any announcement or testimonial issued by the Advisory Committee should take the following form:—

"Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties.

London.....189

"A.B. of who desires to enter the Ministry in this Province has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness.

"Signed {President.
.....Secretary.

"NOTE.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation."

4.—If the applicant does not satisfy the Advisory Committee the result of its investigation shall not be made public, but shall be communicated only to the applicant and to the officers of any other Advisory or Fellowship Committee, or of any Congregation or Central District Association concerned.

The Rev. Dr. DRUMMOND, in moving the adoption of the first clause, said that they were simply carrying out the principle already adopted at Dover, but in view of certain objections that had been raised he might point out that the Advisory Committee was not being imposed on any congregation that might object. It had no power of initiative, and no power of enforcing any decision, but was purely consultative, and depended for its action on a request from the parties concerned. If, therefore, any congregation disliked an Advisory Committee, it would be in no way implicated, but simply allowed others to make use of it if they wished. Thus in carrying out the will of the majority they were not interfering with the individual liberty of their congregations.

The motion was seconded by Dr. BLAKE ODGERS and carried by a large majority.

Dr. ODGERS then moved Clause 2, which, he said, had been drawn with the greatest care, to avoid the trouble which had previously arisen, when the duties of the Advisory Committee had not been clearly defined. When such Committees were first established the intention was that they should fulfil the duties described in sub-sections (a) and (b); but it soon became clear, both in America and in this country, that their most important work would be that dealt with in sub-section (c). Where there were men coming over from other religious bodies and unknown to the churches, it was of the greatest importance to have a recognised Committee who could make inquiries into the character and antecedents of candidates. By this means good service had been done in the past, unfit men had been prevented from making mischief in congregations and had been kept out of the ministry. It was distinctly stated that the inquiries of the Committee should be concerned with the character and personal fitness of candidates only, and not with questions of doctrine. That was essential to their principles. Theirs was an Assembly of Non-subscribing congregations—Unitarian, Free Christian and other Non-subscribing or kindred congregations. They had no standard of orthodoxy, no book of doctrine by which to test the theological belief of any candidate. It was left with each congregation to determine for themselves whether the doctrinal position of any minister was such as to make his services acceptable. Thus, as they proposed in the following by-law, it would be distinctly stated on each testimonial given by the Committee that "all matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation."

Sub-sections (a) and (b) were seconded by the Rev. HAROLD RYLETT and passed.

Sub-section (c) was seconded by the Rev. F. H. JONES.

Mr. E. CAPLETON thought it undesirable that the Committee should advertise too freely its readiness to give such testimonials, so as to encourage outsiders to enter the ministry. A candidate should first apply to a congregation, who might then ask the Committee to investigate. The result of their investigation, whatever it might be, should not be made public, but only communicated to the congregation concerned.

The Rev. H. RYLETT said it was most desirable that the Committee's investigation should come first, before a candidate approached one of the congregations, when an unfit man, with some attractive power, could make trouble.

The Rev. F. ALLEN pointed out that there had not been a great number of such published testimonials, but only thirty altogether in five years.*

* Mr. Allen has written to correct this statement, which was made without reference to the minutes. There were, he says, thirty-one applications in the period named, but the number publicly commended to the churches was, from various causes, only fifteen.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER also objected to the publicity, but said he should move an amendment on the subsequent clauses.

Sub-section (c), completing Clause 2, was then passed.

Dr. DRUMMOND moved Clause 3, and pointed out that the greatest care had been taken to prevent any possibility of mistake as to what was certified. They were anxious in every way to preserve the freedom of congregations.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER seconded the motion.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved an amendment to the effect that Clauses 3 and 4 should read as one, and that no public announcement or testimonial should be issued by the Committee; but the results of investigation should only be communicated to the parties immediately concerned.

Mr. E. CAPLETON seconded.

The Rev. W. C. BOWIE opposed the amendment, and said that when a stranger desired to enter the ministry, the proposed method was best, a simple announcement in the papers to inform secretaries of congregations in the district that there were such ministers available. The knowledge that inquiries would be made, and such a testimonial would be required had proved effectual in the past in keeping out black sheep, who otherwise might have found a way into the ministry.

The Revs. H. RYLETT, H. RAWLINGS, and J. E. CARPENTER also opposed the amendment, which was lost, and the clause was then passed.

On the motion of Dr. DRUMMOND, seconded by Dr. ODGERS, Clause 4 was also passed.

Mr. WALTER BAILY then moved and Dr. DRUMMOND seconded, "That the following gentlemen be appointed to serve on the Advisory Committee till the next annual meeting of the Assembly:—The President, Mr. George W. Chitty; the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. J. Harwood, Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C."

This was unanimously agreed to, and the meeting then terminated.

OBITUARY.

MRS. WILLMER, OF BIRKENHEAD.

We regret to announce the death, at the ripe age of eighty-three years, of Mrs. Charles Willmer, widow of the late Alderman Willmer, J.P., of Birkenhead. Mrs. Willmer was descended from one of our oldest Unitarian families, being the daughter of the late George Harvey, of Moretonhampstead, Devonshire. For the last thirty-seven years she had been a member of the Birkenhead Unitarian Church, and until her health failed was a most regular attendant at the Sunday services. She last attended morning service a little more than two months ago, being then over eighty-three years of age, the minister on this occasion being the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, who was preaching a special sermon. Before being associated with the Birkenhead Unitarian congregation, Mrs. Willmer was a member of the old Paradise-street chapel, and then of Hope-street church, Liverpool, under the ministry of Dr. Martineau and the late Dr. Channing.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Selected from the Psalms and Litanies of Rowland Williams.

God is near to uphold, but far off to understand.

The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom; He bringeth His seekers into light.

What shall we do to inherit life eternal? Let us search out God's holy will and law.

What shall we do when we are fallen from our better mind? Repent, and turn to Him who can renew in us a right spirit.

What must we do to be saved? Trust in Him who upholds our steps in life, and leads us day by day. Trust in God is the beginning, and love is the perfecting of trust.

In the fear and love of God our Father, let us do good unto all men. Opening our mind's eyes to things unseen, let us carry through things temporal, thoughts eternal. Let reverence lead us to humility and courtesy, prayer and patience, and let hope raise us to thankfulness, cheerfulness and obedience.

Let our strength in soberness be strong for duty, and our weakness in humility suffice for patience. Let our life be in Thy sight, when we stretch forth our hands unto Thee; and when out of the deep our soul crieth, hear us, O Lord.

Illuminate our minds with practice of humility, and confirm them with growth of faith. Make us firm in endurance, with liveliness of thanksgiving, and confidence of prayer.

Let us grow up to fulness of wisdom in the bond of love, till we all come to mutual affection, and are perfect on earth, as our Father in heaven is perfect.

Here then, O Sovereign Lord, remembering all Thy mercies and all our unworthiness, and desiring to be at one with Thee again, we offer up ourselves to Thy holy service, and desire Thy blessed thought to be fulfilled in us. We pray that not unworthily, but in good conscience, we may become a temple of the breath of Thy holiness. Save us from all doing or suffering evil, from the sting of evil conscience and from every inordinate passion. Make our thoughts the lively echoes of Thy commandments; and take our hearts for Thy kingdom.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"It's the ones as does it."

ONE day, not very long ago, when a great wrong needed righting in England, and many brave men and women were spending their strength in helping to right it, one of these helpers came into a Liverpool railway-station, carrying in her hand a bundle of papers—printed messengers that were to be sent far and wide to rouse people to think and act as they ought to do in the matter. Straight before her, as she entered the station, stood an old porter, "waiting for a job," and she held out some of the papers to him, telling him what they were about, and asked him to give them to people that he knew. His face was weather-beaten and had deep lines of care in it, and his body was bent with carrying heavy weights. Perhaps he thought that in his hard day's work there was no room for such a mission; for he looked at his barrow and his grimy hands and silently shook his head. This was not the end, however; for in a moment he had changed his mind, and, taking the papers, said in a low voice, "Well, it's the ones as does it!"

Now this old man's second thought was a wise one, and in his odd way he told a great truth; for there is nothing more wonderful in this world than the power which lies in every little deed and word of the humblest and most insignificant among us. Every hour of our lives we are each of us doing good or harm to other people by the influence of our example and even by our thoughts. Do you ever think how quickly cowardice and cruelty and falsehood spread? How in a shipwreck, or a fire, one or two selfish persons can so affect the crowd about them that a panic is the result, and numbers of lives are lost? Cruelty is infectious; as, for example, when a boy teases a helpless animal and his thoughtless companions standing by join in the wicked sport. But happily in this world good is more mighty than evil, and a brave example set and a good word spoken in season carry a wonderful power with them, and their influence spreads on every side.

Did you ever read of the wreck of the Birkenhead? She was a steamer carrying troops and passengers to India. When she struck upon the rock and the boats were lowered and the passengers safely placed in them, there was no room for the soldiers who must stay and meet death on the sinking ship. There they stood on deck, every man in his place, obedient to the officer's commands, and waited the end, bravely firing a volley into the sky as the vessel heeled over and they sank in the waves. This band of brave men was made up of individuals, and it was the spirit of self-sacrifice and courage spreading from one to another that helped them all to die like heroes.

Here is another true story which teaches us a similar lesson. In a china factory, where large numbers of hands were employed, there was one quiet old workman who rarely spoke to anyone, on whom the shadow of a great anxiety seemed to rest. It was noticed that when he went home at night he never failed to take with him a bright piece of broken glass or china, or a roadside flower; and at last one of his fellow-workmen learned, and he spread the news among the rest, that a little crippled boy lay in the old workman's home who was his treasure, for whom he carried back at night the poor gifts that were to brighten the sick room.

A kindly feeling sprang up in this man's heart, and one day he made and painted a little clay jar in his dinner hour, baked it in a corner of one of the great ovens, and put it in the old man's cap. Nothing was said; but the jar was carried home, and in a day or two some one else followed the example. It came to be a habit, at last, for some one always to have some little present ready which the old man carried away to his crippled boy. Time passed: his face became sadder and the workmen said among themselves that the child was growing worse. Those who worked near the old man ceased to talk loud and swear, as it had been the custom of some of them to do; and every day some good-natured, pitiful man did a piece of his work for him that he might go home earlier at night.

At length, one day the old man did not come to the factory, the child was dead; and when the little coffin was carried out of the cottage a hundred or more of those factory men, who had given up half a day's work and pay, stood waiting out of sight in their Sunday clothes to join the little procession to the churchyard, and thus show their silent sympathy. Here again we see "It's the ones as does it," for we can trace back the kindly feeling of the crowd to the kindly deed of the workman who placed the first little gift in the old man's cap.

In the city of Glasgow, at one time, numbers of children used to go barefooted about the streets. One day, a poor woman, bent with age and rheumatism, was seen stooping here and there upon the pathway with great pain and effort to pick up pieces of broken glass that strewed it for a long distance, and as she cleared the path she filled her apron with the glass.

"Why should you do this useless work that is so hard for you?" asked a passer-by. "Oh," she answered, "I'm only picking up the bits of glass that they may not get into the bairnies' feet."

I wonder how many people have been led by this true story to watch for the little kind deeds they can do, the trifles that really make up the happiness of life. Bear in mind, children, the old porter's wise words, "It's the ones as does it," for you can never tell what great results may be brought about in the world by the little good deeds and kind words that are all that you may have the power to do and say. And there is one thing more to remember, and that is that we have nothing to do with the results of our actions. Only let us do our best, let us each be brave, and truthful, and honest, and tender-hearted, sowing our good seed, and God will make the harvest grow.

FRANCES E. COOKE.

MR. P. W. CLAYDEN contributes to this week's New Age the second of two articles on Dr. Martineau. In its course he tells the following interesting story:—"Luunching one day at a coffee-house in Fleet-street, I took up the Westminster Review for December, 1852, and began to read an article on 'The Ethics of Christendom.' Fascinated by the unusual beauty of the style, I read on with a kindling glow of intellectual delight, and moral and spiritual assent. I read it again and again, thought over it, followed up its leading thoughts, and it changed my life." The writer was Dr. Martineau, and the reader soon gave up business to become a preacher of the same "emancipating gospel of a Divine Humanity."

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London."

THE NEW EVANGELICAL CATECHISM.

THE new Catechism issued by the authority of the National Council of Evangelical Churches in England and Wales is in many ways a remarkable document. If we could take it as an adequate presentation of the conceptions and beliefs of the "sixty millions of Christians" claimed as represented by the Council, it would be very remarkable indeed. A great deal of time and care has been devoted to its preparation, and it must be supposed that the representatives of the different sects concerned were desirous of giving their approval to nothing that would seriously differ from the prevailing thought of their respective adherents. It is difficult, however, to think that Calvinistic Presbyterians will really be satisfied with using a Catechism in their homes and schools which omits everything peculiarly characteristic of Calvinism. No word is here as to the Divine sovereignty, but much emphasis is laid on the Divine goodness and love; if the notion of total depravity can be brought under one sentence it is certainly not clearly enunciated; and we look in vain for the familiar catchwords of "predestination and election," "imputed righteousness," the "effectual calling" and "final perseverance" of the saints. A good many Evangelical brethren will have to supplement the Catechism with private interpretations, for there is no hell-fire here, nor eternal torment, nor devil—things which have occupied a large share of attention in popular Nonconformity hitherto. On the other hand, we are a good deal puzzled to see some of the more distinguished signatures appended to this document, when we observe that it teaches that the Decalogue is the brief expression of "God's will," and that the six days' creation is accepted as a matter of course. It is, perhaps, less surprising that the Virgin-birth is retained as a cornerstone of Christian faith, for we know how anxious Mr. PRICE HUGHES and some of his friends were to keep out heresy—and what more deplorable heresy could there be than doubt on this point? But we believe there are a good many thoughtful students of the Bible in several of the Evangelical Free Churches who are not so sure to-day on the point as were the framers of the Nicene Creed fifteen centuries ago. As to the peculiar sacramentarian notions expressed, or half expressed, doubtless those who incline to the simpler and more rational views will be able to satisfy themselves that the words laid down will do pretty well for them if the "high" party will not push them too far. The one thing that specially unites our brethren, apart from their zeal for pure and holy living, would seem to be their hearty and unfeigned abhorrence of a State-made or a State-controlled church. On this point there is no reserve or ambiguity at all—by-and-by our friends may leave behind some of their hesitation on other points. We shall certainly welcome every further step in advance as we welcome this. We beg leave to encourage our brethren to stride more firmly next time, and to that end it will be our duty on other occasions to draw attention more particularly to the weaknesses and defects of this latest "Confession of Faith." At present it is enough to record thus briefly our first impressions, and to offer them with those given below by a few of our correspondents.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF THE NEW CATECHISM.

DR. DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

FIRST impressions are not always to be depended on, and it might perhaps be desirable to take time for a more critical examination before rushing into print. But at the call of THE INQUIRER, I put down a few rather hasty thoughts.

I looked forward with eager expectation to the perusal of a Catechism, which was heralded as representing "the beliefs of not less, and probably many more, than sixty millions of avowed Christians in all parts of the world," and which seems to be regarded as making a great historical event. It may be due to this highly-wrought expectation that my first impression was one of complete disappointment at the weakness and poverty of its theological statements. In masculine clearness and force I think it cannot be compared for a moment with the Shorter Catechism of the Westminster Divines; and if, in this respect, it comes nearer to the Catechism of the Church of England, we must remember that the latter is only a very small portion of the Prayer-Book, and has the Thirty-Nine Articles behind it. Though some of the questions and answers in the new Catechism are excellent, and might be made the basis for much wise teaching, yet, as a theological summary, it must, I think, be regarded as most unsatisfactory. From our point of view we may rejoice that what was known as evangelicalism when I was a boy has almost disappeared, and is represented by only a few unexplained terms; but there is no acknowledgment of this change of view, and no introduction of the learner into the larger world of modern times. The description of the Bible is probably intended to be in harmony with our later knowledge; but it is a most meagre and inadequate account, and could not convey to a learner the faintest notion of what the Bible really is. The doctrine of the Trinity is reduced to a little more than two lines, and the statement would be as welcome to Sabellius as to Athanasius, almost all the essential points of the dogma being absent. The answer about Jesus Christ says nothing of his eternal generation, or his co-equality with the Father or the union of two natures in one person, and does not call him God, though he is once referred to as God in a subsequent answer. He is said to have "atoned for all our sins," but no explanation of this is given, and to the mind of a child it will probably convey no meaning whatever, while adults may interpret it in quite contradictory senses. It is said that he "broke the power of sin"; which, considering the enormous power which sin has had, and still has, in Christian countries, requires to be explained. The fall of Adam and total depravity have disappeared; but we are told that man was made innocent at the first (which nobody can possibly know), and that he fell into disobedience, and "since then no one has been able, in his own strength, to keep God's law." This implies that before then man was quite independent, and would, "in his own strength," keep God's law—surely a very questionable proposition. Hell, with all its torments, is banished; but we are told that sin, if not repented of, "must issue in death eternal." This seems to teach the doctrine of conditional immortality; but can this have been intended? Some ancient statements are retained without explanation, which it is impossible for any educated man to believe, except in a figurative sense. Thus we are told that the Son of God "came down from Heaven," and "ascended into Heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father," and the statement of the Fourth Commandment about creation is given as though it were authoritative. Surely this must convey very anthropomorphic ideas, and a notion of creation which is known to be false. Throughout there is no attempt to bring Christian theology into relation with our modern knowledge. The vast spaces of time before Christianity, the vast tracts of the earth's surface since Christianity, in which there has been no knowledge of Christ, are utterly ignored, Astronomers, geologists, and historians have laboured in vain; and there is not the faintest hint of any great spiritual law encompassing the earth, and operative through the ages, of which Christianity is the highest and fullest expression. While welcoming and sympathising with this attempt to effect a large union of Christians on the basis of the most fundamental doctrines, I nevertheless find it hard to believe that the sixty millions will be satisfied with a statement which seems to lack the strength and precision of the old orthodoxy without making any open advance into the larger and more spiritual Christianity of modern times.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD.

I do not feel inclined to say much about the new Catechism. The question that most interests me, is, What will be said about it by those for whose use it is prepared? If it is really acceptable to them, and comes into large popular use as fairly standing for the general faith of the so-called "Evangelical" Churches, then it marks a great advance towards spiritual as distinguished from creedal Christianity. It is true that it does not put the old doctrines in any clear outlined form, and some will probably object to this as weak. Yet surely it is what we have been pleading for all along. We have maintained that all those sharp definitions of religious truth are essentially wrong, and the cause of division. And it is a great gain that the members of so many religious bodies, having come to feel their essential unity, should have been anxious to emphasise their points of agreement, and should have succeeded so well.

THE REV. R. A. ARMSPRONG, B.A.

To me the Catechism seems a singularly melancholy exhibition. Dogmatic difficulties are slurred and fundamental differences of religious conception are bridged over by language which seems selected for its convenient ambiguity. That the distinguished leaders of English Nonconformity should conspire to produce a tract like this shows that they misconceive the true basis of religious unity, finding it in verbal co-incidence rather than in spiritual sympathy; and that they are blind to the true condition of a vigorous Nonconformity, which lies in bold and lucid thinking, in uncompromising expression, and in acknowledged diversity of doctrinal conviction.

THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., Vice-Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

"The great object of the Committee," says Mr. Hugh Price Hughes, "has been to express the Christian doctrines held in common by all Evangelical Free Churches." This is a very remarkable undertaking, for the Committee claim to represent at least "sixty millions of avowed Christians in all parts of the world." The result is no less remarkable, for it shows how the controversies of an older day have passed away. The Calvinist and the Arminian here join hand in hand. The technical language of predestination and justification by faith is dropped. Not a word is said of total depravity or original sin; there is no allusion to the devil; question and answer are silent about hell; everlasting punishment is nowhere named. Similarly the darker features of the older schemes of the atonement are all veiled; there is no hint of substitution; the conception that an innocent Son became the victim of the Father's wrath is quite out of sight. Whatever indefiniteness in some of the modern formulæ may still render such views permissible, it is clear gain that they are not enforced. No child brought up on this Catechism need lie awake half the night in terror lest he should find himself in hell in the morning! The first impression, therefore, which I derive from its perusal is that the last fifty years have produced an immense amelioration in the theological climate, and the second is that in the next fifty years the Evangelical Free Churches will come to recognise the Unitarians as Christians. The Christian religion is thus expounded.

Q. 2. How must we think of God?

A. God is the one Eternal Spirit, Creator and Sustainer of all things; He is Love, boundless in wisdom and power, perfect in holiness and justice, in mercy and truth.

We are then told that Jesus has taught us to call God "our Father in heaven," and that from this name "we learn that God made us in His own image, that He cares for us by His wise providence, and that He loves us far better than any earthly parent can." That is, in brief, the religion of Jesus. The essence of the whole matter is there. Nothing can long keep asunder those who can accept these declarations. Now we know how it is that so many Unitarian hymns have been adopted into Evangelical hymn-books. We have at last arrived, in substance, at the same view of God conceived as the one Eternal Spirit, and His relation to man.

It is quite true, however, that the perception of this deep underlying unity may be hindered for a long time yet by the diversity which other portions of this Catechism imply. The "mystery of the Blessed Trinity" is introduced in Q. 19; but it seems unrelated to the general scheme. The Incarnation and its sequel are treated at much greater length, and the elaborate answer to Q. 11 deserves careful examination clause by clause. The whole of this section of the Catechism seems to belong to a mode of thought incongruous with the fundamental religious conceptions already cited: it is connected, of course, with the cycle of the Messianic ideas to which also belongs the doctrines of the Second Advent (Q. 51) and the resurrection (Q. 50). In these respects the Catechism still clings to the letter of New Testament language. In other cases that position is frankly abandoned. Thus the first "Adam" has vanished; "man" is said vaguely to have been made innocent at first; but the whole of Paul's parallel between the first and second Man is destroyed. I cannot even notice now the ecclesiastical clauses. They belong to the same by-products, and are not essential. But my third and final impression is that while the element of aberglaube (as Matthew Arnold called it) is still strong in the Evangelical Churches, the ethical significance of Christianity receives a fulness of recognition never accorded to it in such a document before. In spite of some serious weaknesses, therefore, I hail this Catechism as a most important step forward.

THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

From every point of view the "New Catechism" is a most interesting document. It appears to have been compiled with three objects in view: (1) To manifest to the rest of Christendom the substantial theological unity of the various forms of Protestant orthodox dissent; (2) To furnish material for religious instruction in the home and school; and (3) To set up a standard of orthodoxy for the men and Churches belonging to or desirous of joining the Federation. The first two reasons are avowed; the third, which really would appear to be the most important of the three, is unavowed. Its authors disclaim "authority." But they are men of great influence, and I am satisfied that the Catechism they have promulgated will come to be regarded as an authoritative creed, and will be used as an instrument of pressure to check the growth of liberal opinion. Will any Church be admitted to the Federation which repudiates the definition of a Free Church, or of sin, or of Divine Being, which the Catechism sets forth? In how many Churches will the heresy-hunters be prompted to ask: "Does our minister believe all this?" As a Catechism for use in Sunday-schools it cannot be regarded as a success. With the exception of the sub-section on the ten commandments and the Lord's Prayer, it is not simple enough, nor ethical enough for children. Its phrases bear too much evidence of compromise. It is clear that in many cases there has been a careful balancing of words and sentences and clauses in order to secure a vote nem. con. Unanimity is not claimed. Result: Dr. A. may read into some of the answers a good dose of liberalism, while Dr. B. reads into the same answers a stiff dose of orthodoxy.

However, the most important question arising upon the production of this Catechism, published with such a fanfare of trumpets, is this: What is going to be done with it? Is this piece of theological finesse to be used for theological pressure?

THE REV. JAMES HARWOOD, B.A.

The Rev. H. Price Hughes, in the current number of the Contemporary, is naturally jubilant at the completion of the Catechism, over whose production he has been the presiding spirit. He expected its preparation to occupy ten years at least, and here it is at the end of two. Though it does not claim any ecclesiastical authority, yet the fact that it has been prepared by a council of prominent leaders from all the "Evangelical Free Churches in England and Wales" (except the Society of Friends), who "represent directly or indirectly the beliefs of not less, and probably many more, than sixty millions of avowed Christians in all parts of the world" will, doubtless, cause it to be widely used. We expect it will be found serviceable in the homes and schools for which it is intended, for though the catechetical form of instruction is out of favour just now, yet it has its advantages in the way of definite teaching. A good teacher can make the fifty-two answers (one for each Sunday in the year) when committed to memory, texts for more vivid impressions, while even a poor teacher may be kept on the track. On the whole, the language is simple and the style terse.

With regard to the matter we cannot but admire the skill shown in skating over thin ice. Even within the evangelical fold there are well-known differences of belief, and roomy phrases, therefore, must be found, if all were to be accommodated. What a wide field of controversy, for example, is covered in the answer to the eighth question (Are we able of ourselves to fulfil God's law?)—"No; for although man was made innocent at the first, yet he fell into disobedience, and since then no one has been able, in his own strength, to keep God's law." The student of theology might fairly ask for something more precise than this, but it is not for him that the Catechism is intended. Its theology is emphatically Christocentric; the doctrines of the Trinity and Atonement are made essential; the Bible "is the inspired record of God's revelation given to be our rule of faith and duty" (a definition which seems to make equally binding, without any appeal to soul and conscience, the Old Testament and the New, and the several parts of each). It is right to add that the ethical side of religion is not forgotten, and that the brief expositions of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer are very well done.

There have been those among us who resented the exclusion of Unitarians from the "Free Church Federation." Now, at any rate, they will see how impossible it was that room should be found for them in an organisation whose theological limitations are defined in the Catechism. Alike by its silences ("Hell," "wrath of God," "saving blood," "eternal torment," "plenary inspiration," and other old watchwords, are conspicuous by their absence,) and by some of its emphasis the Catechism is significant of important changes. The process that has been at work among the "Evangelical Free Churches" for forty years is not yet at an end, and it may well be that after another forty years' progress the use of this Catechism and the associations that will then have gathered about it will cause serious difficulties. But for a time, at any rate, it will probably serve to draw more closely together the various churches comprised within the Federation.

MR. FREDERICK NETTLEFOLD.

I regard the title of the new Catechism as distinctly misleading, and consider that the word "Free" should have been omitted, or at least qualified; for no church can be really free that is bound by a declaration of belief be it a Catechism, Creed, or any other formulary. The title should properly have been "A Catechism for Evangelical Churches which are free of all control by the State, and acknowledge no head but Jesus Christ."

Subject to that objection the Catechism is, in my opinion, a distinct advance on anything of the kind hitherto put forth by the Orthodox Churches. Compromise is of course plainly stamped upon it, and we may imagine what searching of heart there was on the part of those who allowed some of the questions and answers to be "finally adopted without a dissentient vote."

For myself I regard this publication as a temporary expedient; something else will ere long be required to meet the advancing thought of the day, and we may well hope that Churches which now reject any restraint on the part of the State will not then suffer themselves to be bound by a formulary compiled by any Committee however "enlarged."

THE REV. W. COPELAND BOWIE, M.L.S.B.

The significance of the Catechism lies as much in what is omitted as in what is included. Among the things that may be said to have disappeared are the devil, hell, everlasting torments, the wrath of God, miracles (with the exception of the Virgin Birth), the verbal inspiration and infallibility of the Bible; and practically every shred of strict Calvinism. The Godhead of Christ, though implied in two or three places, is not distinctly and clearly affirmed; and most of the phraseology used about Jesus might be employed by Unitarians. The emphasis placed on the Fatherhood of God, the tender note of love and sympathy which runs through several of the answers, and the importance given to questions of character and conduct, mark a distinct advance on previous catechisms of an orthodox type.

Its defects are manifest enough. Compromise is written on nearly every page. Several of the answers are simply verbiage: they may mean anything, or nothing. There is no firm intellectual grip, no logical sequence in the propositions, such as you find, for example, in the Shorter Catechism. The Church as an ecclesiastical authority, and the Priesthood as the channel of divine grace, are set aside. The theology of the Catechism is apparently derived from the Bible, but it is not clear whether it is the Bible of our Protestant forefathers, or the Bible that is left after modern criticism has done its work. The good and earnest men who compiled the Catechism evidently allowed reason and conscience, the natural emotions and the spiritual aspirations, some freedom of operation: they will probably find ere long that they have set in motion forces of thought and life that will not be content to rest with a great many of the conclusions reached in this Catechism. The definition of a Free Church will require amendment. It must be made to include all who worship God in spirit and in truth. A place will then be found for the Anglican, the Roman Catholic, the Christian Unitarian, the Theist, the Hindu; and many others who, it would seem, are shut out from communion in the Evangelical Churches.

THE REV. JOHN BYLES.

I cannot but think that the leaders of the Free Church Council, in issuing a Catechism, have gone out of their way to perpetrate a blunder. The symbol of beliefs which they have put forth on subjects, so many and so varied, must be of necessity a compromise, and to that extent unreal. It is clear also that the Catechism contains within it that which must alienate the sympathies and awake the antagonism of a no inconsiderable section of thoughtful and inquiring spirits. This is, to say the least, unfortunate, and must be prejudicial to the position of the Free Churches as leaders of thought. Moreover, by the adoption of what is virtually a creed, the Council and the Churches, so far as they are represented by the Council, have to an extent surrendered their position of intellectual freedom and independence of thought, and have so far allied themselves to the very forces they came into existence to oppose. The action taken by the Council is, in my opinion, much to be deplored, and exactly as my sympathies are with the Council, and with the work they are seeking to accomplish, do I personally regret it.

THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

Notwithstanding the ambiguities in the wording of the new Catechism, and notwithstanding the ambiguity of its silence on matters of importance, I agree with those who on the whole congratulate the evangelical brethren on their manifesto. If it fences Unitarians out, it takes in a good deal of the light that we rejoice to spread, especially as to the divine Fatherhood, and the practical aims of Christianity. And although the signs of verbal adjustment, not to say trimming, are in places painfully obvious—painfully to people who are accustomed to the straightforwardness of independent thought—the Catechism records in a remarkable manner the progress of catholicity of temper among the sects, and the desire for the widest practicable brotherhood.

CULTURE AND LIFE.

"Such a to-do! They tried me with their books; Lord, they'd have taught me Latin in pure waste."

—FRA LIPPO LIPPI.

WHEN a coxcomb asked Confucius how many stars there were in heaven, he told him that he minded things nearer. This was a most refreshing answer, for true it is, and sad, we think, that learning and culture do, in the majority of cases, take a man farther off in the direction of the stars rather than bring him nearer to us. Indeed the chatter for culture tends to become even more disgusting than the chatter against it, as the latter is only contemptuous, while the former is distinctly cruel, as well as contemptuous. Both are forms of cant arising from a half-view; Dr. Pangloss and Dick Duberly each thinks himself the representative man. How manifest is this state of affairs in many of our churches. Of course, in many cases the minister is not a man of sound learning. Half the curates do not know their Hooker or their Barrow and Butler, but only flimsy hand-books on them; but in cases of real culture and learning there is often for all of it a great gulf fixed between the pulpit and the pew, or at least the free seats. Learning does not realise itself in enlightenment; culture does not become eyes to the mentally blind, or feet to the spiritually lame. At first sight, perhaps, this is not much. The parson drones on and the people doze placidly; and, in the words of the poet, "Nobody seems one penny the worse." But it is time that tells: and it is pitiful enough now when on all sides the people who have not been able to grasp the ideas of religion are going back to the things of religion—the toys of their childhood.

Abraham Hayward, in his admirable little preface to his translation of "Faust," speaks of the "peculiar, truly great, and principal direction" of that work as being "the establishment of peace between the Real and the Ideal." We do not need to be reminded that "Faust" was the production of the great Apostle of Culture. Epictetus compared the philosopher's lecture-room with a surgery, to which one came with an abscess and another with a dislocated shoulder, and the philosopher was there, not to string together fine sentences, but to do the work of a surgeon—so did Socrates, so did Zeno.

Jesus Christ was largely Jesus Christ because he went straight to the heads and hearts of the people. Luke seems to have written his life on the distinct understanding that it was worth writing because he did this. Perhaps Jerome was right when he said that Jesus Christ is vulgar to a Saturday Reviewer, which is to say that the main question of those who chatter about cultivation is: "Is not this Joseph, the Carpenter's son?"

The intellect and the heart must be united. Away with those meddlers who are perpetually getting up to forbid the banns! The words that come from the head want to be warmed in the heart's blood first. A purely intellectual age may be a very narrow age. The eighteenth century thought poetry had realised perfection in Mr. Pope, who, for all his cleverness, was so destitute of ideas that he had to steal his philosophy from Bolingbroke. Swift is, of all the writers of that age the strongest thinker, and he is the plainest writer of prose. Its wretched artificial poetry was banished by a new poetry which came more from the heart than the head. Lecky, in his history of that century, discussing representative government, states that the most highly educated electorate does not necessarily argue the realisation of the broadest policy, and he gives, as an illustration, Oxford and Cambridge, which have been throughout history the steady opponents of political progress.

Our culture is too narrow; our learning savours too much of the cloister; it does not take in the great industrial world. The Gospel according to Adam Smith is as worthy of study as the gospel according to anybody else. Nature conquers in the end, and we cannot improve nature without knowing it and its development. It was the natural feelings of the mother which overthrew Augustine's diabolical theology pertaining to unbaptised infants, not the arguments of textual commentators. It was not the ordained preachers of peace who reduced European wars, they increased them; it was the merchant class which saw that wars disturbed the markets. In a certain sense Lowell was right in saying that Carlyle was a bad historian because he looked upon the people as a "mob without volition." Many of the ideals which learning and culture have afterwards explained and expanded and, so to speak, sublimated, had their origin in new habits of thought and changed ways of looking at things, brought about by the fact that industrial activity drew men into practical contact with all sorts of people.

Have we, then, nothing to say to the men who are doing with the hand, or the men who are doing with the heart, what we are trying to do with the head? Cannot the three be united? The brotherhood of man is not only ideal, it is real. Platitudes in the pulpit only make it more far away; it has been going on, developing in history unconsciously. If our culture and learning make us realise this, as they ought, then ought they to bring us into the deepest sympathy with every variety of life.

MEMORIAL WINDOW TO THE LATE MR. CHARLES WOOLLEN.

A most impressive service was held at Upperthorpe, Sheffield, on Sunday morning last, conducted by the Revs. John Ellis and George Knight, in dedication of a window to the memory of Mr. Charles Woollen, whose devotion to our cause will not easily be forgotten by this generation. The window is the work of the eminent artist, Mr. Henry Holiday, of Hampstead, a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy. The subject is "Charity," symbolised by a graceful figure carrying a little child on her arm and leading an older one by the hand. It is depicted with the careful draughtsmanship and rich colouring characteristic of the artist, and is wonderfully suggestive of the spirit of the text "Now abideth Faith, Hope, Love—these three—and the greatest of these is Love." It bears the following inscription:—

To the glory of God and in memory of Mr. Charles Woollen, 37 years a Trustee of this Chapel, who died April 11th, 1898, aged 82 years. This window is erected by his friends and fellow-worshippers as a loving memento of his genial life and devoted labours.

The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. JOHN ELLIS. Special hymns were sung. The lessons were 1 Cor. xii. and xiii. At the conclusion of the second lesson Mr. Ellis said:—This magnificent hymn of love, which at all times appeals to the best in us, is especially impressive this morning as we assemble to dedicate this beautiful window to the memory of our departed friend, Mr. Charles Woollen. This Scripture was very dear to him. In its spirit he sought to live. He caught its glow. Its spirit was expressed in his genial life. Love was at the heart of his transparent good. Love was the fount of his unbounded generosity; love was the motive of his devoted labours; love enabled him to bear, with a stout heart, troubles that would have weighed many another man down. He was a conspicuous example of one who was sustained by love—love of God and love of man. As we gaze, from week to week, on that symbolical figure, we shall call to mind the virtues of our friend. May it serve to rebuke our narrowness, our want of sympathy, our indifference, our indolence; may it shame us, if it do not win us, into more strenuous endeavour to exemplify the beauty of our faith in earnestness of life. Friends far and near have gladly contributed to the cost of our memorial in token of their admiration of a beautiful soul. Those of us who assemble for worship within these hallowed walls do not adequately dedicate our gift unless we at the same time dedicate ourselves anew to truth, to duty, to religion, in the spirit of love; unless we seek, as he did, to refresh our spirits at the fount of life in the fellowship of common worship: unless we go out from prayer, as he did, to the higher service of humanity. Let the lesson of his life sink into our hearts. Let our symbol remind us that—"Love beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never faileth. Now abideth these three, Faith, Hope, Love, and the greatest of these is love."

The Rev. GEORGE KNIGHT preached from the text 1 Cor. xiv. 1, "Follow after Love," and in the course of an address, which paid a high tribute to Mr. Woollen's career and life, said that the window expressed the appreciation of the many people who knew him, for qualities which won widespread admiration and confidence, and which made Mr. Woollen a power for good among them. It was the witness of an unselfish life, devoted through evil and good report to the furtherance of his faith. His career was an example which they would do well to follow. "This to his memory, for we held him dear."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

It was one of Bismarck's favourite sayings, I believe, that "You can't make bread out of barm alone." Neither can churches be made out of mere agitation, revivalism, "forward movements," or any other sort of special effort. It is the general effort that tells; if that is strong and wise and persistent a little spurt of enthusiasm will hurt no one; even a great spurt (if one could see it) might be risked pretty securely. Just now, unless I am mistaken, it is the general work, rather than anything special, which occupies the attention of our London churches; although, as I shall show by-and-by, there are indications of a forthcoming great effort which will demand all the energy and enthusiasm of our people. Meanwhile, steady, straightforward congregational work is the prevailing order of the day. The prospects differ, of course, according to the conditions, here and there brighter, yonder duller; but no prospect is bad where in the church there are faithful people and a faithful leader, who are doing together the good work given to them to do, whether by popular measurement it is called large or small. It has been my good fortune to see something of the work at many of our churches, and to hear of others. It is good work that is going on, generally; and in some places, any thoughtful person seeing the facts—all of them—must say it is very good work.

To refer to one branch only—the Sunday-schools appear to be, on the whole, conducted intelligently and effectively. Experts will at once say: "Have you as many teachers as you want? Are they persons properly equipped for their duties? Are the children not only attracted in early years, but kept in touch as they grow up? Are the schools really 'nurseries' for the churches?" To all which the reply must, I confess, be a guarded one; but at any rate, it will not be a discouraging one. More teachers are wanted at several schools, if not most; and when the "grace of God" really touches some of our well-to-do young people, and they become aware of what their life was meant for, they will cheerfully follow the example of a goodly company of their class who are devoting a little time—or more—week by week to this work. As to retaining the elder scholars and making Church members of them, I have no means of speaking confidently about more than a few places. I do not think that the congregations, as a whole, are much recruited from the schools; but some very active members do come to us in this way.

I am persuaded that, in London, it is becoming more and more necessary to concentrate attention on the Sunday's work among our young people. Classes, institutes, and other educational agencies abound, and the children who formerly came to evening classes and societies connected with church or chapel are finding their way, in increasing numbers, to these more public institutions. In so far as they find greater means there for intellectual or manual training, we must rejoice for their sake and for the sake of the whole community; but the need of moral and spiritual training remains as urgent as ever. If their week-nights are less at our disposal we must make their Sundays the happiest, most helpful possible.

A feature of our congregational life which is more noticeable just now, I think, than at one time, is the interest shown by our churches each in the work of the others. On the North side there have been some pleasant gatherings of members from different congregations; in the South organised effort in this direction has been less evident, but a fairly large roll could be drawn up of friends who occasionally visit other congregations than their own, and of some pluralists who give a good deal of time to social and benevolent work in connection with several of our churches. I hear of one congregation in the West sending out wholesale invitations to brethren in the faith for a forthcoming social meeting. The East has its examples not wholly dissimilar. The idea is good; it need cost but little money, and only asks a bit of wise and kindly brotherly activity on the part of the organisers.

If the omens are to be trusted we shall shortly have much more to chronicle in the way of united effort among the congregations shortly. Readers of THE INQUIRER have already heard much about the project of a Great Bazaar—they will hear more yet. I have good friends who are sorry to think so. "Steady congregational work?" Yes. Even "Forward Movements" now and then; but a Bazaar? The situation, unique in many respects, recalls something of what happened when it was proposed to hold a meeting of the Triennial Conference in London. The gravest doubts were expressed, not by the indolent or apathetic, but by some of the wisest and most loyal workers amongst us. It was "all very well" for Manchester or Liverpool, or Birmingham, or Leeds. Those people in "the provinces," you know, they can do these things; they are not so distracted, not so blasé as Londoners; besides, there are more of them. So ran the remarks of the wise and prudent. Courage, courage! Then the thing got done, and done well (so Londoners modestly thought), and as for numbers, was it not written in the book of the chronicles (to wit, THE INQUIRER at that date) that the gathering of Unitarians and their kin was the largest on record in this hemisphere since the days of Pentecost? Adsit omen!

I understand that one of the steadiest currents adverse to the project springs from a desire to do the thing required—namely, to raise a sum of money adequate to the demands of pioneer and missionary work in this great city, by means less "mixed" than a bazaar offers. Why not a well-organised, widespread subscription, say of "Five Thousand Guineas"—or "Fifty" if a national building fund is preferred—on the lines of the centennial funds now being raised by several groups of churches—Methodist and others? I do not see why such a fund should not go hand in hand with the work of the bazaar. E pluribus unum was ever our motto. Let not him that prefers one method despise the other. As to the bazaar, it will be what we make of it. I have seen bazaars that under the name of "sales of work" included some remarkable, or even questionable, things. On the other hand, I was recently at one such function where there was good work to buy, some "lovely as a dream"; there were good workers, true ladies to do the selling; and the buyers seemed to count it a privilege to part with cash under such conditions. Well, whatever we shall make of our bazaar, the long and the short of it is, the Committee is at work, all sorts of plans and proposals are being mooted, the date and place are as good as fixed; and there is good hope that, when a few more points have been duly considered as to the scheme under which the expected fund will be applied, the case of the promoters of this most important work—being an excellent case—will be endorsed by the handsome backing of those kind and generous friends who have never failed the good cause in times of need.

Allusion has been made to the "Forward Movement" work. Special courses of Sunday evening sermons have taken place in a fair number of our churches, and others are arranged for the spring. Very encouraging reports have been sent from different quarters. Amongst them I may mention Kilburn, Wood Green, and Forest Gate. At the last of these the Rev. H. W. Perris began his ministry in October, and the prospects are decidedly better than in any previous stage of this new church's history. His Forward Movement sermons attracted a great deal of notice and were well reported. The Committee entrusted with the financial support of these operations at the different churches secured the services of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, missionary agent of the London and S.E. Provinces, and under his direction some seventeen services in all have been conducted by different ministers at Ealing and Walham Green, districts where we have no church at present. The numbers attending have not been large—sixty or under. At Ealing, however, nearly half the expenses were saved by well-sustained offertories; and at Walham Green some welcome signs of interest presented themselves. If there were only funds enough much more might be done.

Funds—and men. Work outside the regular congregations has been unfortunately hampered lately by the rather serious disabling of several of our ministerial brethren. Their places have had to be filled, and this has taken away from the available stock of preachers. I am glad to say that the Rev. J. Harwood, of Brixton, is now in full work again, the Rev. George Carter, of Peckham, is progressing well, and expects to be in his normal health quite soon, and the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Kensington, is steadily, if slowly, getting strong again. At Hackney an important church is pastorless, but it is hoped a settlement may soon occur. Readers of THE INQUIRER will be interested to know that the Editor who discourses to them, his invisible congregation, week by week, has been an invaluable ally in our pulpits in this somewhat difficult period. W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bedfield.—On Wednesday evening, the 4th inst., the Christmas-tree party was held. The school children and a large number of adults were present, also a party from Framlingham. On Sunday evening a lantern service was held.

Birmingham: Hurst-street.—The Christmas and New Year treats to the poor and the social gatherings have this season imposed a very heavy, but cheerfully borne, strain on the mission staff. The treats to the poor have included a Christmas Eve distribution of home comforts, clothing, &c.; a special distribution to distressed military veterans, a Christmas breakfast and gift for destitute children, a tea, entertainment, and Christmas tree for crippled children, a dinner and New Year's gift for aged poor men and women, a tea and gift for Girls' Sewing Club, and a Cinderella party for slum children. In this way, and including 860 children clothed under the auspices of the Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, some comfort and Christmas cheer has, through the agency of the mission, been provided for not fewer than 2,600 people. The social gatherings of the mission workers have included tea parties, entertainments, Christmas trees, &c., for separate gatherings of the Sunday-school scholars, the adult class, the P.S.A., the Band of Hope, the congregation, the mothers' meeting, &c., attended in the aggregate by about 1,500 persons. An interesting feature of the teachers' meeting was the presentation by Mr. W. J. Clarke, on behalf of the Teachers' Society, of a handsome family Bible, together with an illuminated address, to Mr. W. W. Sorrell, on his unavoidable retirement from the work of the Sunday-school, after having rendered valuable and conscientious service as scholar, teacher, superintendent, vice-president, &c., for a period of upwards of thirty years. The New Year services, on the 1st and 8th insts., attracted very large congregations, the chapel being filled at each of the three services which are now held every Sunday.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The annual Christmas party was very successful, over 400 assembling for tea on Saturday, Dec. 24, after which an entertainment was given. On Jan. 2 the Hon. Mrs. Klein, of Liverpool, opened our twenty-first annual Christmas Fair and Sale of Work, and it was gratifying to note the presence of a number of those who attended the first fair held in the old buildings in Commission-street. On Jan. 3 the Fair was again opened by Mr. J. J. Bradshaw, F.R.I.B.A., of Bolton. The sum of £302 was raised, which will go towards current expenses and the liquidating of the debt of £250 on our new school premises.

Brisbane.—The following letter has been sent to Miss E. Burditt, by Mr. Horace Burditt, of Birkenhead, Corinda, near this city, Nov. 23, 1898:—"You will be pleased to know that I am now corresponding with Mr. Lambley, of Melbourne, who has sent me a packet of Postal Mission pamphlets, which I am distributing gradually to such as appear likely to be interested in them. I have it in my mind to see if a monthly meeting of Unitarians can be arranged, in the hope of forming an informal congregation. If we can do this, Mr. Lambley says he will try to pay this colony a visit. One or two residents at Bundaberg have been writing to Mr. Lambley about organising a congregation there. I fear this is premature, and have suggested commencing with the Postal Mission. I receive a few copies of each issue of the Melbourne Unitarian magazine, called Month by Month, and send a copy to the editor of the Bundaberg Star, who has leanings in our direction. It seems not unlikely that when any congregation is started in Queensland it will be more likely to be at one of the country towns rather than at Brisbane, where people in business are seldom resident in or near the town. The same causes militate against the formation of one that caused the break-up of the old congregation at Little Carter-lane, in London, of which chapel my father was a trustee."

Bristol.—In the course of his twenty-second annual address at Lewin's Mead on the lessons of the "Dead Year," the Rev. A. N. Blatchford recalled the names of the most celebrated men who had died, including Prince Bismarck and Mr. Gladstone, between whom a striking contrast was drawn. After referring to the wars of the year, Mr. Blatchford said: "And yet a worthy memory of the dead year fills us with the spirit of hope as we ask again the anxious question whether war must for ever be the final arbitrament between contending peoples. For lo! out of the simple and sincere and humane heart of the young Lord of Russia and her myriad legions has risen in sweet solemnity, the generous and the glad response that it need not be, and that, God helping him, it shall not be—and so from his pinnacle of military power he bids his brother rulers, and urges all the nations, to reason together over the awful waste of life, of talent, and of wealth so sadly signified by the tramp of Europe's armed millions—to curb the ruthless spirit of war, and give to industry the wasted powers of a wearied and a poverty-stricken world. To the sacred plea of peace on earth, the heart and influence of the young Emperor are nobly, unselfishly, and spontaneously offered. Who is there who loves his kind, seeks ever the faithful discharge of that second of Christ's commandments, and tries, at least, to love his neighbour as himself that will not pray for a blessing on such a thought, and such a purpose?"

God grant that the kind young ruler's prayer may find a loyal and an answering echo in the minds of the captains of his legions, and the masters of his ships, for these are verily they with whom, at first, it lies to give effect to their young Sovereign's most beneficent intention. Wide may the sweep of his generous thought extend, and warm and unreserved be its welcome in the heart of every potentate, and in the homes of every State; and amongst them all what people should hail them more gladly, or more willingly than our own?"

Bridgwater.—On Monday evening last a large gathering of the Sunday scholars took place at the Northgate Hall, at tea, and afterwards the scholars were joined by a number of friends, members of the congregation, and parents. The Rev. T. P. Broadrick presided, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. The prizes, numbering twenty-nine, were distributed by Miss Spiller, who urged an increased attendance at the school and morning service.

Brighton.—On Monday, Jan. 9, the Sunday school party and distribution of prizes was held when the lecture hall was crowded by the children, their parents, and members of the congregation. Over twenty prizes were awarded for regular attendance and good conduct. Silver brooches were given to two girls—sisters, who had not missed a single Sunday for three successive years. Through the kindness of Mr. Charles Green we were able to have a very enjoyable entertainment. It being the twenty-first anniversary of the school, every child received a small present, besides the threepenny pieces kindly sent every year by Mrs. Dobson. Hearty thanks were given by the children to Mrs. Dobson, Mr. Green, the Rev. Alfred Hood, and to the teachers.

Cirencester.—Wednesday, Jan. 4, was a day of festivity for the children and friends of the Sunday-school and choir. Besides a bountiful tea there was the usual Christmas-tree. Prizes were distributed by Mrs. Austin.

Clifton: Induction of Rev. J. Warschauer.—Last Sunday, Jan. 8, the Rev. J. Warschauer, M.A., Oxon., began his ministry at Oakfield-road church, preaching in the morning on "Spiritual Sufficiency," at night on "Spiritual Authority." On the preceding Friday afternoon an induction service had been held, when the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., offered the dedicatory prayer, while the Rev. Professor Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, and the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., delivered the charges to the congregation and the minister respectively. Professor Carpenter who had, more than thirty years before, begun his ministry at the same church, asked his hearers to consider the church in three different aspects—namely, in relation to its own members, to the world, and to the other churches around them. He begged the congregation to give their new minister their confidence, and to extend to him the same patience and goodwill which he himself had enjoyed among them a generation ago. A church must never forget its mission—the spread of righteousness and the warfare against evil; let them not offer to God a worship that cost them nothing. Their minister was to have full freedom of utterance, even though his opinions on the pressing questions of the day might not always be theirs. Lastly, let them be steadfast in holding and proclaiming their own form of faith and encourage their minister to expound it, and jealousy and suspicion on the part of other communities would die away in time. Mr. Hargrove, in addressing the minister, spoke of the glorious calling to which he was devoting himself: well might his soul magnify the Lord, and his spirit rejoice in God as he contemplated his duties! There was scarcely any rest, Mr. Hargrove continued, to pronounce a warning against anything in the nature of priestly assumption—they were not priests, but ministers, called to serve, not to "lord it over God's heritage." They had to remember this, and not merely to please themselves, or do and say just what commended itself to them, irrespective of the wishes of their congregation. Yet neither were they to forget that they had been appointed to the office of teachers, on the ground that their training had given them a special knowledge on certain subjects—a knowledge which qualified them for the expression of definite opinions on those subjects. In this respect, and in this alone, was there a distinction between clergy and laity—just as they themselves were "laymen" as contrasted with any other specialist, be he doctor, lawyer, or engineer. They would not be truly serving their congregations by always falling in with their views, expressing agreement when they did not feel it, or telling them their conduct was good and noble when it was not. Coming to controversial preaching, he remarked that it was easy—and not always unpleasant or avoidable—work; but by establishing their own tenets, demolishing those of others, and acquiring a fame as debaters, they would not fulfil the chief duty of the ministry, which was the raising up of souls to a sense of the divine, to influence the lives of their hearers for good, to inspire them with faith and trust in God. Let the new minister aim at this, and his ministry would be a true success.—There was a large attendance, and the church was prettily decorated.

Dukinfield.—On Saturday last the Old Chapel congregation gave their annual treat to the aged people of the district, without distinction of sect or party. Four hundred and twenty persons sat down to a sandwich tea, and were waited on with loving care by our Sunday-school teachers, who also provided a very bright and interesting entertainment. The Rev. H. S. Tayler took the chair, and spoke words of cheer to the aged guests. There were ninety-six persons between the ages of 60 and 65 years, 131 persons from 65 to 70, and 172 from 70 to 80, and 21 persons from 80 to 90 years of age. Many of the guests were poor, and expressed themselves deeply grateful for the kindness shown them. On Saturday, Dec. 31, the annual congregational party was held. Three hundred assembled. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. James Kerfoot, chapel warden. In addition to the minister's address the Rev. H. E. Dowson also addressed the meeting. The scholars' Christmas party was held on Monday, Dec. 26. Five hundred scholars and teachers were present. The various dialogues were repeated next evening for the benefit of the parents and their friends.

Ilkeston.—We had a visit from the Rev. Promotho Ioll Sen on Sunday, Dec. 4, when he preached to a good congregation, who were much helped by his discourses. On the following Thursday he took part in a course of lectures on "England's Empire," lecturing on India. On Dec. 29 we had a visit from Professor Carpenter, who lectured on "How to Read the Gospels," which was reported at length in the local papers. Our annual school party was held on Jan. 4, and prizes were awarded to scholars and members of the choir. The report read by Mr. Smythen showed the school to be in a satisfactory condition, with an increase in the number of scholars. We had a small sale of work in November and realised £5. We propose holding another bazaar on April 19 and 20, in the hope of raising sufficient money to clear off the debt, arising from the alterations to our chapel.

London: Essex Church.—Many London friends will be glad to hear that Professor Estlin Carpenter will preach at Essex Church to-morrow, and also on the Sunday after.

London: Lewisham.—The meetings of the Literary and Scientific Society for the second part of the session 1898-9 were resumed on Jan. 9. Mrs. G. W. Hodgson (our organist) provided an excellent programme for a musical evening, and there was an appreciative audience of more than a hundred people.

London: Peckham.—At the Band of Hope meeting on Friday, Jan. 6, a pithy spirited address was delivered by Mr. Jas. Ritchie, Secretary of the Lambeth Band of Hope Union, and on the same evening a New Year's Devotional Temperance Service was conducted in the church by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who in a thoughtful earnest address urged the necessity of continuous work in every good cause.

London: Welsh Services.—Owing to the majority of the members attending these services at the Council Room, Essex Hall, having gone on a visit to the Principality over Christmas and New Year's Day, there was no service held on those two Sundays, but they were recommended last Sunday, when there was a very good attendance. Mr. Delta Evans delivered a very able address on "Object in Life," based on Eccles. ix. 10. The musical part of the service was made more attractive by having the use of the piano which has been lent by the B. and F.U.A.

Manchester: Bradford.—The annual scholars' party and prize distribution was held Jan. 7, when over 200 scholars were provided with tea. The after meeting and entertainment was presided over by the minister, the Rev. W. E. Atack. The prizes were distributed by Mr. G. H. Leigh, of Monton, who expressed his pleasure at seeing so many bright faces and knowing of their excellent attendance and behaviour during the year. He said he hoped the time would not be far distant when they would be removed from the cramped quarters they now occupied, and placed in a more suitable and commodious building, which the rapid expansion and development of the work required.

Moretonhampstead.—Through the kindness of Mr. Bowring the Sunday-school had its annual Christmas treat on Dec. 27. Mr. Coniam presented a Christmas-tree, and many helped to make the party a success.

Paisley.—A social meeting and limelight entertainment was held Jan. 5. After tea, the lecturer, Mr. T. H. Taylor, L.D.S., took his audience in imagination upon "A Tour through Northern and Eastern France with a Camera." On the motion of the Rev. A. C. Henderson, B.D., a vote of thanks was awarded to the lecturer. An excellent programme of songs and recitations followed.

Pontypridd.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached here on Monday night to a congregation of between five and six hundred, who sympathetically listened to and highly appreciated the eloquent discourse. At the request of the members of the Unitarian Church the English Congregational Church was kindly lent for the occasion, and their organist presided at the organ; the singing was hearty and general. The South Wales Echo, an evening paper, published at Cardiff, in commenting upon the above, states that "They are letting in the New Year very well at Pontypridd by a display of Christian brotherliness and tolerance that is good to see. . . . I am pleased to see this tribute to the right of free belief, and this mark of respect also to the scholarly Stopford Brooke, who is one of the foremost literary critics of the day, and whose fame as a preacher is equally great as his popularity as a writer on English literature." The Glamorgan Free Press, besides inserting a portrait and a short biographical sketch in a leaderette, says: "Dr. Stopford Brooke is a prophet of the first rank, a seer who penetrates below the superficial distinctions into the heart of humanity, a man with a message instinct with faith, hope, and love, a message of life and joy."

Reading.—On Thursday last a social meeting connected with the Church Guild was held in the Assembly Rooms, Bridge-street. There was a good attendance, about 70 being present. The proceedings were entirely of a social character, part-songs (by the choir) and other vocal and instrumental music, which, with recitations and conversation, made a very pleasant and successful meeting.

Rochdale.—The New Year brings the first half of the winter's work to a successful termination. The annual sale of work opened by the Mayor had for gross receipts £138. At the Christmas party 600 persons were present; many more were unable to gain admission and the entertainment will be repeated. The Rev. T. P. Spedding has delivered a series of six week-evening lectures on his visit to the Holy Land. The lectures were illustrated by 300 slides, nearly all of which were from Mr. Spedding's own negatives. At the prize distribution eleven scholars qualify for silver medals awarded for three years' complete attendance; three others for gold medals, representing seven years' complete attendance; and certificates will be given to one scholar for twelve years', and two others for ten years' unbroken attendance. Eighty-three prizes for attendance have been won. The scholars' averages for 1898 are 136 morning, and 259 afternoon.

Sidmouth: Welcome to the Rev. W. Agar.—In order to welcome the recently-appointed minister—the Rev. W. Agar—a soirée was held on Wednesday evening, the 4th inst., in the schoolroom, to which members and friends were invited, and although the weather was somewhat unpropitious, about one hundred were present. Mr. Dennis B. Squire occupied the chair, and amongst others present we noticed the Rev. H. Gow (Leicester), Rev. T. L. Marshall, Dr. Leon, Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mr. Hunter, Mrs. Velland, Mr. Isaacs, Dr. Jolliffe (New York), Mr. and Mrs. Haslam (Bolton), Mrs. Poynting (Birmingham), &c. The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, stated that they were met together to give their new minister a welcome, and said it was a great satisfaction to him, as he thought it would be to others, to have another minister amongst them after a lapse of six months. Referring to the Sunday-school he was pleased to see they had so many scholars, and to find it in such a satisfactory condition, thanks to the untiring energy of the ladies who taught them. He moved a vote of cordial welcome to the Rev. W. A. Agar on settling amongst them, and expressed the hope that he might long continue to be the minister of their congregation. Mr. G. Isaacs seconded. He had known the congregation for a long time and during that period they had had only three ministers, which showed they got on well together. He then amusingly related the condition of the old chapel when in its thatched state, and referred to the many improvements since effected. The Rev. T. L. Marshall, in supporting the resolution, said he was himself only a retired minister and a recent comer to Sidmouth, but he thought he might venture, on behalf of the ministers of the district, to give a cordial welcome to Mr. Agar. He referred to the happy diminution of sectarian antagonism, pointed out that their work was not dogmatic or controversial, and expressed a hope that Mr. Agar would cultivate friendly relations with all denominations as he himself had in his former ministry. He was glad to find the congregation and school in so satisfactory a state. Mr. Wood, a member of the congregation, having added a few words of welcome, the Rev. H. Gow said he had known Mr. Agar as a brother minister at Leicester for some time and congratulated the Unitarians of Sidmouth most sincerely on having him amongst them. The motion was carried with acclamation. Mr. Agar said he should have been pleased had they allowed him to come amongst them in a quiet way, but at the same time he was grateful to them in for the kindness they had shown him. From the first he had received a warm reception, and he liked people who showed the warmth of feeling which was expressed that evening. He was pleased that his old friend had come and given him God-speed. With such a warm welcome and such a beautiful place as Sidmouth to live in, if a man could not do well and be quite happy there must be something wrong, and if he did not succeed they must put it down to failure on his own part. He trusted they would become united and all work together as one man. His chief work was to join, if he could, rationalism—a free rationalism—with reverence, and he was willing to help in anything that would further any good cause in the town.

Yarmouth.—The Rev. W. Rodger Smyth last month delivered a lecture on "What has Christianity done for Man?" The report of his remarks, which was published in a local journal, led to an interesting public correspondence, in which the Unitarian contribution to the work of Christianity was defended by Mr. Smyth.

ETHICAL RELIGION.

*The New Testament of Jesus
for Theists.*

A Compilation of Selected Passages Freely
Arranged without Note or Comment.

Published by WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street. Price One Shilling.

Sold by PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand.

If it is "the Personal Religion of Jesus" that we would learn; what He actually taught, and what His real Life meant—not what other men believed or declared of Him after His departure—this "reasonable quest of sacred truth" must be directed to that portion of the books in our possession, which can be relied upon as an historical record. Original written documents, fairly well attested, were available in the Apostolic age. These were, first, the reports of public discourses, heard and noted down by Matthew, who would, from the nature of his secular business, be able to write in his native language, though Peter and John, the fishermen, were at that time illiterate men; and secondly, the collection of biographical data gathered by Mark, when he served the Apostolic missions as secretary, from his conversations with men who had accompanied Jesus in Galilee. To these materials we may safely add the parables, likely to have been preserved by frequent oral repetition at Christian meetings; and a few obviously characteristic personal anecdotes.

A serious attempt, a merely tentative essay, is here ventured, to show that such probably genuine elements of the books called "the First Three" or "Synoptic Gospels"—which books, in their present form, cannot be proved to have existed before the middle, at any rate, of the Second Century—may be separated from whatever additions or interpolations should appear due to anonymous, irresponsible, literary compilers, in those composite, amplified narratives, our "Scriptures," which were subsequently adopted by the ecclesiastical canon. It will not be deemed a reprehensible intrusion. It is now submitted, but with some diffidence, only as an experiment, in the hope that more competent scholars will soon undertake this needful task. The following rules for determining the unauthenticity of passages abounding in the "Three First Gospels" are laid down by the Rev. Dr. Martineau in "The Seat of Authority in Religion" (Edition of 1890, pages 577, 593, 596, 652):—

"THE VEIL TAKEN AWAY."

"1. Wherever, during or before the ministry of Jesus, any person in the narrative is made to speak in language, or refer to events, which had their origin at a later date, the report is incredible as an anachronism.

"2. Miraculous events cannot be regarded as adequately attested, in presence of natural causes accounting for belief in their occurrence.

"3. Acts and words ascribed to Jesus, which plainly transcend the moral level of the narrators, authenticate themselves as his; while such as are out of character with his spirit, but congruous with theirs, must be referred to inaccurate tradition.

"The first of these rules compels us to treat as unauthentic, in its present form, every reputed or implied claim of Jesus to be the promised Messiah.

"While it is impossible to reach any original attestation, which we can appreciate as adequate, to substantiate the tales that would be incredible to-day, nothing is more certain than that, in the state of mind out of which the Church was born, miracles would have been freely believed, whether they had really happened or not."—(Page 593.)

"The application of our third rule, excluding what is incongruous with the personal characteristics of Jesus, is a much more difficult and delicate task for the critic than he encounters with the other two; nor will his handling of it, however cautious, bring conviction to those who require more definite grounds of belief than those afforded by harmony and disharmony in the shades of character. And yet, to those who cannot help being affected by such phenomena, there is nothing more persuasive."—(Page 596.)

"THE RELIGION PERSONALLY REALISED."

"If Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God."—(Page 652.)

PSALMS OF THE WEST.

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.

"We have in this volume ninety Psalms of modern times containing innumerable beautiful sentiments."—Christian Life.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE letter from Mr. Richard Robinson, which will be found in another column, makes a further suggestion as to the use to which a "Twentieth Century Fund" might be put by our community. A scheme for the raising of the standard of ministerial support is certainly worthy of the most careful consideration, no less than that for a national Church Building Fund. Will the Committee of the National Conference take this matter up, and thus lay their hands upon an effective movement for the benefit of our churches?

THE £100,000 which Lord Kitchener asked for to secure the foundation of a Gordon Memorial College at Khartoum has been more than subscribed. Over £100,000 has been given in London alone, while the whole fund stands now at over £118,000. At a meeting of the General Council at the Bank of England on Wednesday, Lord Salisbury, seconding a motion of thanks to the Lord Mayors and other Chief Magistrates for their help in the matter, said that this great enterprise had been imposed upon us by the growth of the Empire. It was a great effort to break down the obstacles of race, to establish the bonds of intellectual sympathy, and to further the pursuit of human culture. It was essentially a moral undertaking, and the municipalities of the kingdom had insured its success. The meeting was reminded that the Gordon Boys' Home was the original national memorial to Gordon, and the hope was expressed that this might not suffer in consequence of the success of the Khartoum College.

OF the starting of new associations and societies there is no end, but we confess to some interest and sympathy in one of the latest which calls itself "The West Indian Missionary and Industrial Association," with its temporary headquarters at Exeter Hall, though its real field of operations is the West Indies. The President of the Association, the Rev. Hubert A. Parris, is himself a negro, but withal an educated, earnest, thoughtful man. The circular setting forth the objects and methods of the Association, though hailing from Exeter Hall, might quite as well have proceeded from Essex Hall, judging from the emphasis which it places on the development of character and on freedom of thought. The promoters of the Association desire to preach a pure, simple, Protestant gospel which acknowledges "the leadership of Jesus, through whom we understand the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. There is an industrial as well as a missionary side. It is proposed to acquire a few acres of land on one of the sparsely inhabited islands and to set some of the more promising natives from the overcrowded plantations to work thereon. They are accustomed to hard labour, and they are familiar with sugar-growing, and could easily produce many preserves greatly prized in the home markets of England. They are to have a reasonable time given to pay for the land, and it is believed that if the opportunity were afforded, many of these West Indian negroes would progress morally, intellectually, and spiritually, if only they could be made to "feel their manhood." It is estimated that the sum of £200 would place the scheme on a sound basis.

UNDER the title "The Crisis in the Church," Messrs. James Clarke and Co. have re-published the letters of Sir William Harcourt addressed to the Times in the latter months of last year. A further statement of the position of the opponents of Sacerdotalism was made on Thursday week at a meeting of the National Protestant Church Union, Viscount Middleton in the chair. A memorial to the Queen was adopted, the terms of which were read by Prebendary Webb-Peploe, Organising Secretary of the Union:—

It declared:—(1) That there is widespread dissatisfaction and disquiet in the land arising from the fact that a considerable number of the Clergy have been for some time past secretly and openly engaged in the avowed purpose of undoing the work of the Reformation; (2) that the Memorialists had no desire to narrow the comprehensiveness of the Church, which within the limits of the Prayer-Book had existed for the last three hundred years; that their complaint had reference to the introduction of Mediæval doctrines and practices which were deliberately rejected by the Reformers and have no place in the formularies of the Church of England; (4) that these practices had driven loyal subjects from their Parish Churches, and had thus deprived them of the religious privileges to which they were legally entitled; (5) that the sanctity of home life had been invaded, and the strength of the English character imperilled, by the re-introduction of auricular or sacramental confession; (6) that the attempt to disturb the Reformation settlement had been much encouraged by the instruction given in some Church of England Theological Schools; and (7) that the urgency of the need and the difficulty of finding a remedy for these grave evils compelled the memorialists to humbly appeal to Her Majesty to take such measures as in her wisdom might seem to be called for to preserve the Nation from the sacerdotal errors which were cast aside in the Sixteenth Century.

WE learn from the Manchester Guardian that a secession has taken place from the Dukinfield Parish Church. Repelled by Ritualistic innovations, a section of the parishioners have determined, it is said, to secure for themselves the means of enjoying the form of church service to which they have always been accustomed. An iron church is in course of erection, to be called the Wycliffe Memorial Church. It is added that there is no intention to form a sect, and the seceders intend to partake of the Lord's Supper at the hands of duly ordained clergymen of the Church of England. It will be at once remembered that the Methodist Societies established by John Wesley set out with a similar intention of faithfully conforming to the rites and requirements of the Established Church. There may be a warning in the reminder both to the seceders and to the church from which they have seceded. If the church drives its members away, it does make them Nonconformists; if for any reason whatever a party leaves the Episcopal Church and sets up a service of its own without the sanction of "the ordinary," such a party is a party of Dissent. It is of no use to disguise hard facts with soft names. The provocation to Dissent now felt by many hundreds of quiet members of the Established Church is a very serious matter; it is serious when it leads to earnest thought and resolute action; it might be more serious if nobody felt inclined to stir. All honour to those who make sacrifices for conscience' sake. But they should think once, twice, and three times before adding one more to the numerous sects already in existence; and they are bound to remember that however nearly they may follow the Church of England services, if they are not acting in obedience to the officers of that Church they are Dissenters, as decidedly as if they were Quakers, Baptists, or Unitarians.

THIS month's Expositor contains an interesting article by the late Henry Drummond, on "The Problem of Foreign Missions." Originally delivered as an address at the opening of the session of the Free Church College, Glasgow, in 1890, the article deals very frankly, but also sympathetically, with missions and missionaries. From a wide experience of travel round the world, Professor Drummond points out the great variety of missionary fields, and the consequent diversity of gifts required. As instances, he takes (i.) Australia, where there is "a civilised people undergoing abnormally rapid development," and where "the chief problem of Christianity is to keep pace with the continuous growth; the immediate peril is that it may be wholly ignored in the pressure of competing growths." (ii.) The South Sea Islands, where growth has not yet begun, where the people are in a state of utter savagery, and there is no religion. (iii.) China, an instance of arrested development, where there is immense conservatism and a powerful religion already in possession. (iv.) Japan, a country which, after centuries of stagnation, suddenly awakened to a new progressive life, claiming a place among the civilised nations of the modern world.

For these very varied mission fields, Professor Drummond urged that men of different types were needed, and pleaded that the Mission Boards should be more generous in their welcome of men of independent mind than they had been in the past:—

I am not arguing for free-lances, or budding sceptics, or rationalists being turned loose on our mission fields, but for young men—and our colleges were never richer in them than at this moment—who combine with all modern culture the consecrated spirit and the Christ-like life. . . . It ought at least to be understood that what qualifies to-day for the leading churches at home ought not to disqualify for the work of Christ abroad, but that there is for Christian men of the highest originality and power a career in the foreign field at least as great and rational as that at home.

As to China, it was noted that Europeans are regarded as an inferior and barbaric people by the Celestials, and the ordinary missionary is listened to as a Red Indian might be by a London crowd. There was therefore need of very different methods, and a far higher standard of culture than had hitherto been usual among the missionaries, if any real impression was to be made on the Chinese.

OF Japan Professor Drummond said that at that moment it was the most interesting country in the world. Everything that belonged to modern civilisation the Japanese had adopted, except one, and that they were bent upon securing. They were searching for Religion, and every branch of the Christian Church was active in Japan—Greek and Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Unitarians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Independents, even Theosophists and Spiritualists were there at work; and all had an impartial hearing. The final result he expected to be some form of Christianity, and probably not the Roman Catholic or the Greek. One of the most intelligent of the native Japanese Christians said to Drummond:—

"We have got our Christianity almost exclusively from the missionaries, especially from the American missionaries, and we can never thank them enough. But after a little we began to look at it for ourselves, and we made a discovery. We found that Christianity was a greater and a richer thing than the missionaries told us. Perhaps they themselves were second-handed. At any rate, we must henceforth look at it for ourselves. We want Christianity, not perhaps necessarily a Western Christianity." His next sentence was expressed with some hesitation and much delicacy, but it meant this, "In the past they have helped us much; but . . . they may now . . . go."

On another occasion when Drummond had addressed a number of native Christian ministers, their spokesman, in reply to his request gave this message to the Churches in England and America: "Tell them to send us one six thousand dollar missionary, rather than ten two thousand dollar missionaries." And again: "Tell them that we want them to send us no more doctrines. Japan wants Christ."

DR. WELLDON, before sailing for India to take up his duties as Bishop of Calcutta, delivered a valedictory address at St. Peter's, Eaton-square:—

The British Empire, he said, was the most conspicuous human fact on earth, and to all appearance its influence and duty would not grow less but rather greater in the future. While he believed with all his heart in the mission of our race, he did not believe in it except under the control and sanction of religious faith. Our race had many virtues, conspicuously that of success, but there was also about it a certain harshness, a certain lack of consideration and sympathy, a certain cruelty, which to a certain extent marred the beneficence of its work, had led us in the past into grave disputes, and had resulted in our being respected and obeyed but not loved. The Church was called on to correct that disposition, to be everywhere the advocate of justice and mercy, to be full of sympathy for the races which were under the sceptre of the British Empire. He believed that her influence might and ought to become more powerful, more sacred, more divine. The British race had a special responsibility towards India, where the great missionary was not the Church but the State. If all the Missions of the Gospel were to leave India to-morrow the Missionaries' work would go on, because a great Christian civilisation could not be placed side by side with another and perhaps lower type without producing an immense and an immediate effect. So the question of Christian belief was not raised by the Church in India, though the Church aspired to answer it. She might do this in two ways—first by the direct teaching of the Gospel, of which it was impossible to over-rate the value. Yet if he were asked to what agency he looked with most hope for the ultimate conversion of India he should say it was to the example of Christian society and of devoted, exalted Christian lives. When the Christians of India were all Christians, then the heathens would be Christian too. It was sometimes said that missionaries did more harm than good; but what really did harm was when those in responsible and authoritative positions, being Christians in name, led lives that were a defiance of moral and Christian teaching. There was a great sphere for Missionary work in India both for men and women. What was wanted was the conserved energy of those who looked not for earthly rewards, but only to the happiness of giving their lives to the service of their Lord and Master. He earnestly asked their prayers, that he might do in India, by God's blessing, some good, and not, by his errors, much harm.

THE new Catechism of the Evangelical Free Churches will not only be freely criticised, no doubt, but very widely adopted. One defect in it, so it seems to us, cannot fail to be noticed by any teacher who tries to use it. It is everywhere full of allusions rather than of definite teachings. The child who learns it is supposed to know the Scriptures and the orthodox commentators. The Shorter Catechism supposed a child to be ignorant of Genesis and Romans and Hebrews, and gave him such information from these (or from those who have written about them) as he might require. But the precocious child of the present day talks of the Son of God being incarnate by the Holy Ghost when he has never been told who the Holy Ghost is, and only learns seven weeks later that the Holy Spirit (if his teacher tells him it means the same) was sent forth (whence and whither?) at Pentecost. Commend us to the style of the old Shorter Catechism where the child is at least taught definitely if erroneously: "There are three persons in the Godhead—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory." The language of the Shorter is also much more simple. Unless the child of the Free Churches is already an accomplished theologian he will not understand much of Ans. 23:—

By the secret power of the Holy Spirit working graciously in our hearts, and using for this end providential discipline and the message of the Gospel.

Poor little child! What will he do with it?

THE National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches have signalled the New Year not only by the issue of their new Catechism, but by the publication of the first number of the Free Church Chronicle as their official organ. (Memorial Hall, E.C. Twopence monthly.) The aim of this new periodical, which is illustrated and opens vigorously, is to keep before its readers the ideal of the Free Churches in their new union, and to supply regular information as to the progress of the movement.

WE have been interested to receive from Madras a copy of The Fellow-Worker, a Theistic journal, devoted to religious and social topics, in which is published in full the lecture on "Buddha—the Prophet of India," delivered in Madras by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams. The lecture was delivered in the Pachappa's College, with Mr. Justice Subramany Iyer in the chair.

THE CHURCH OF UNFETTERED FAITH.

FAITH that is free indeed is not confined. By ancient dogmas that have had their day,—

The hortus siccus of the narrow mind,
Where flow'rs once fragrant crumble in decay:

Nor will the word of any master bind
The heart that worships Truth, and seeks her, come what may.

R. BRUCE BOSWELL

G. F. WATTS, R.A.—II.

Two other pictures of death must be mentioned. The "Court of Death" is a very large canvas. The atmosphere is somewhat heavy, and the chamber is in gloom, but there is a brilliant light beyond. Seated upon a throne, there is a stately figure, clad in ample robes, and holding a tiny babe in its lap. Two great angels are drawing back the heavy curtains of the grave, revealing the golden lights beyond. The babe is the figure our artist always paints as his emblem of new life. This is to be presented to all who enter the gloomy chamber; and there come into it all sorts and conditions of men and women. The king willingly lays down his crown, the soldier unhesitatingly gives up his sword, the cripple brings his crutch, the scholar his books, the tired mother her care, and the strong man his strength. These are all surrendered in the Court of Death, and the bringers of them get in return the gift of the new and real life.

"Sic Transit" represents a dead warrior stretched upon a bier, a shroud is over his form, and the things in which he was interested in his earthly life are scattered round about. Here rests a laurel wreath, musical instruments, his shield and his books. The inscription which is painted on the curtain hanging at the back of the body is:—"What I spent I had; what I saved I lost; what I gave I have." The force of this truth is powerful in the presence of the dead body. All that we can secure during life, for our own purely personal gratification, is lost at death; while all of our time, talents, money, or self that we gave to the world is ours in that crisis. These, our genuine gifts, constitute our only real riches. True, riches are not those things we secure for ourselves, but what we give of ourselves—character not accumulation. What I saved I lost; what I gave I have.

Such are the methods Mr. Watts adopts in dealing with the darker problems of life. His optimism is great enough to persuade him that all these dark things may be overcome. He believes that man's chief work is to conquer them. In a picture he calls "Aspiration," he depicts a youth with eyes keen, feet firm, and noble bearing, clad in bright armour and holding aloft a standard. He has just begun to learn that life is not all play. Mrs. Watts writes about the youth in this fine picture of her husband's: "In the dawn of life's battle, he who is to be the standard bearer looks across the plains. He sees into the great possibilities of human life, and the ardent spirit of youth is subdued to the burden of its responsibility."

"Faith" is not at all an easy subject to represent on canvas, unless you imagine an anecdotal scene, but the way our artist has dealt with it is well worth considering. The writer remembers standing by the canvas when it was incomplete. Mr. Watts said: "I think I have got a modern idea there." The figure is that of a woman who appears to have hurried away from a burning city and has found refuge in a little rocky solitary nook. She has been engaged in some exciting doings, but is now unbuckling her sword to throw it away, as being, after all, a poor argument, and is washing her blood-stained feet in a pool of cool water. She is now listening to the singing of birds and enjoying the fragrance of sweet flowers that are upon her lap. The ancient faith is indicated in the burning and smoking city in the background. Nations thought they were successful when they overthrew their neighbours by desolating their country and putting their inhabitants to death at the edge of the sword. That was the ancient faith, but not so the modern. We are learning to turn our back upon the argument which consists of the wail of the ruined villager and the roar of cannon. That there is a feeling of this kind very widely spread there is no doubt, but the growth towards it seems very slow. Our progress is upward, however, and love leads the way.

"Love and Life" is painted to show this. The scene is upon a mountain pathway. The road is narrow and difficult to climb, and there are many sharp-edged stones about, and the chasm on either side is deep and dark. In front there seems so much haze that the traveller can scarcely see how to step. Life is represented as a feeble, delicate, timid girl. She does not feel equal to her task. Her steps are uncertain and fear bears its impress in every line of her figure. She cannot go backward and to go forward would be to enter into mist. Her feet are hurt by the rough stones, and she is afraid that she will fall. Such is one aspect of life, but there is another indicated by the artist, which must not be overlooked, or we should believe Mr. Watts to be a pessimist. Just in front of the frail girl there steps a strong manly figure, full of life and confidence. His wings tell us he belongs to the spirit world. His bearing seems to say that he is sufficient for all the difficulties life has to meet in its upward climb: he is love and he is strong to support, tender to sympathise with weakness, and confident to stand secure even upon giddy heights. How often the human part of us cries out, almost in despair, for such a companion, when the very being is by our side. His voice is always urging us to leave the lower and seek the higher, though the higher leads we know not whither. It is the voice of God, for God is Love.

The latest exhibited picture of Watts is "Love Triumphant." Time, Death, and Love have been running a race across the plain of Life. The goal has been reached, but Time is dead and Death is dead, too. Over their prostrate forms Love reaches upward, and with face beaming with joy and arms outstretched, sends forth his song of praise to Heaven. In "Love and Life," Love was doing splendid work, but in "Love and Death" the beautiful figure of Death was the victor. It was overcoming poor little Cupid, crushing his wings against the door of home, and entering; but that Cupid is a different being from the Love who, in this latest picture, is triumphant. Love is painted usually by Mr. Watts as a splendidly developed, beautiful youth, but Cupid is a winsome but wilful boy. There is a difference between true love, which is of God, and that which we misname, which is born of selfishness.

One feels, on looking at the Cupid series, that the artist unbends here. He is full of fun, and thoroughly enjoys his work. In it, all kinds of life's phases are depicted. The amazement that comes to one on realising the beauty of Nature, and the mystery of life is beautifully represented by two little fellows just entering a beautiful bit of country. One is tasting grapes and carrying flowers, and the other is watching butterflies; both are delighted and amazed at the lovely land in which they find themselves, and seem to ask, "Where have we come from? What are we? Where are we going?" "Cupid Asleep" shows the possibilities of life lying dormant. "Promises" is the same cheeky, chubby boy delightedly holding out pretty roses to the spectator, but there are many thorns between those roses and yourself. Promises are made, without remembering the many difficulties that are in the way of our performing them. "Performances" shows the boy sitting on the ground sulkily and cruelly pulling to pieces the wings of a yellow butterfly. "The Habit does not make the Monk" represents the same saucy boy knocking at a door, hiding his roguish face behind a monk's cowl, as if to persuade the opener that he is a pious monk rather than a romping Cupid.

Mr. Watts believes very strongly in the uplifting power of women. "Eve Tempted" and "Eve Repentant" are beautiful studies of the female form and powerful dealings with the subject of Temptation. But "She shall be called Woman" is the rich embodiment of the author's ideas on this question. The whole canvas is occupied by the large figure of a woman's body which reaches through the clouds to the sky, but her feet are firmly planted upon the earth. She is thus the connecting link between earth and heaven, the spiritual influence leading upward. The spring flowers of hope grow where she treads, and the lily, the emblem of purity, blossoms by her side. Timid doves are not afraid to hover about her knees; the butterfly, emblem of the soul, is flying just above her head, and her face is hidden from our view because she reaches to her highest capacity, and ever faces heaven's light to give to earth some of its radiance. Such is the lofty conception Mr. Watts has of woman's work in the world. He believes woman is destined to play the greatest spiritual part, and that from her side of humanity we are to expect the real permeation of heaven's Love and perfection through the haunts of men.

The great and mysterious Power which most of us recognise as being behind, around, and in all Nature, so difficult to comprehend, more difficult to speak about, and still more difficult to represent in colour and form, is not omitted in these great works of Mr. Watts.

He has painted a deep blue background, which wonderfully indicates immense space, and in its midst there is a strange, mighty, and attentive winged figure turning in its two hands a sphere containing great systems which astronomers tell us are regularly moving in space. The Spirit watches and carefully governs them all. One Mind conceived them, and the same Mind now guides them. It is the Great Spirit that pervades immeasurable space. Mr. Watts calls it "The All-Pervading."

An equally successful attempt to depict a difficult idea is found in "A Dweller in the Innermost." Conscience is the subject, and the artist has given material form to a soul and made the voice which speaks to all men visible.

In the midst of mingled cloud and light, which seems to have enormous depth, is seated a patient, kind, yet very firm figure. She has arrows and a trumpet upon her lap, a small ruby heart hanging from her neck upon her bosom, a star upon her forehead, and eyes of light which seem to pierce you through and through. Her lips are just parted as though speaking with a still, small voice. But the gentle voice is not always heeded. Then the trumpet is brought in use, and if its blast is unheeded the arrows are effectively used to arouse to a sense of danger, and to save from disaster. The arrow hurts, but even the hurting is performed by weapons of Love. That is the meaning of the ruby heart upon the breast. The star upon the forehead gives the light of Truth, by which the spirit observes our doings.

From these pictures we gather, then, the message of Mr. Watts to our time and a picture of his own aims in life. We look in vain for humour, but find an earnest religious purpose in everything that has come from his brush. Considering it vanity to paint so as to exhibit one's cleverness in the work, he has persisted for a space of sixty years to tell the people of his day his highest conceptions of life and duty. He has never descended to sectarianism, although, for so many years, he has painted religion. No cross can be found in his pictures, no devil, no Christ. "If I painted Christ," he once said to me, "there would be many people like Buddhists who would not consider my work was for them. But these principles are universal, they cannot be bounded by local ideas." For his artistic models you must go to ancient Greek sculpture, but for the thought which his pictures express you must search the best religious principles in all the religions of humanity. They point to the highest, broadest and most spiritual conceptions of life, they speak emphatically against all kinds of sin and oppression, and chant the praises of Love.

LITERATURE.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF ENGLAND.*

SINCE the days when Hume penned his fascinating but inaccurate work the study of history has made gigantic strides. On the one hand, the conception of its purpose has broadened as the people has gradually assumed the sovereign power, each new stage in its enfranchisement awakening it to fresh inquiry into the ways of the mass of men in distant ages, and begetting in the minds of those who would serve it an increasing desire to write the story of the nation rather than that of the men who ruled it. And, on the other hand, the work of Macaulay in ransacking old chests for contemporary evidence of the events he wished to describe, has left us a legacy of extended scholarship and minute research into details which is fast rendering a "Short History of England" a term of the very widest latitude. All this has greatly tended to specialisation, to the study of "periods" in place of the history as a whole, to a man's devotion of his whole energies to the consideration of a single reign. When one sets before him Freeman's "Norman Conquest," Miss Norgate's "Angevins," Froude's study of a portion of Tudor times, Gardiner's account of the early Stuarts, and Lecky's "Eighteenth Century," which together will present him with but portions of the whole story, he has the beginnings of a larger library than most men possess; and when the whole has been written with the care, the patience, the fidelity which mark these portions, it may well seem as if a whole lifetime were too little for the study of a subject so vast.

No one, probably, will be found to say that such labours are in vain; yet, as the race of life becomes increasingly swift for most of us, it must needs follow that works like these, and those which are to fill the remaining gaps, will engage the attention of ever fewer men and women. Scholars there must remain to readjust the aspects of truth, and set in their places the new meanings it reveals, to whom these larger treatises will be a first necessity; but for most men some shorter, simpler guides will be required. In the work before us the author has sought to give such an epitome of the twelve centuries after the first landing of Cæsar on our shores. It is not insignificant that of this period eleven centuries are dealt with in the first volume, and one only in the second. That fact in no wise convicts the author of neglecting the earlier portions of our history, but simply makes evident the difference that exists between the number of available authorities for times before, and times after the Norman Conquest. Whatever there is that relates to the Celtic and Norman periods he has faithfully followed, and one of the most admirable features of his work is the careful manner in which he has dealt with the barbarism and early civilisation of our people, making fullest possible use of folklore, place names, and ancient monuments to state his case. With mere theories he has but little to do. His special personal enthusiasm for deciding upon the actual sites of battle-fields is almost the only direction in which his own theories lead him; for the most part, the book is simply a somewhat handier statement of things recorded and recovered by previous writers. The fact that the list of authorities consulted fills thirteen pages will show how thorough has been his research, and a glance at almost any page will convince the reader that he makes no statement without an authority to back him. Notes frequently occupy a third of the page, containing not only references, but everything of a controversial nature, or upon which there is a conflict of evidence; so that the reader may, if he wish, read the text as a continuous narrative without troubling himself to discover on what authority it is based, or, if he be dubious about any point, may find ready to hand a reference to the source from which it is obtained. This is as it should be, for the work will appeal to three classes of readers, the student who is preparing for some higher examination, and who will hardly ever need the notes; the general reader—who will probably never look at them; and the careful student who will weigh them every one. On this, the more mechanical aspect of the work, let it be added that there is a very full index of more than fifty pages. It will scarcely be expected of a reviewer living far in the country, with only his own library to aid him, that he should verify many of these references, but I have looked up about fifty of them and found them correctly given; it would need the British Museum or the Guildhall to enable one to do them justice, or say more as to their value.

With regard to the style of the book, it is straightforward and even, easy to read, save for an occasional affectation of antiquity in the spelling of names, seldom rising into enthusiasm, yet full of the true historic interest. Whenever there is an important battle to be described it is followed with an amount of detail which clearly shows that Sir J. H. Ramsay must have visited nearly every battle-field he describes. The most successful chapter, in my opinion, is that in which the author describes the preparations of the Conqueror, his landing in England, and the fight at Senlac. This, as other conflicts, is very well illustrated by a plan, which shows both the nature of the land and the disposition of the forces, and which renders the study of the action doubly interesting. I have never read any account of this important battle which set it so clearly before the mind.

The author tells us in his Preface that "a weary length of years has been devoted to" this work. There is certainly no trace of this in his pages, but everywhere there is shown an ardent love for his task, the result of which is seen in two volumes that are bright while they are accurate, full without weariness, and which it has been a pleasure and a profit to read. We trust that their author may be spared to complete the work of which this is the opening instalment. FELIX TAYLOR.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THERE are not many articles in this month's Nineteenth Century calling for special mention in our columns. M. Yves Guyot supplies a clear and orderly account of the "Dreyfus Drama" as far as to the close of last year. He accuses the Jesuits of being the real culprits at the back of the forgers and lawless officers whose doings have brought the great Republic into the present most serious dangers. On the other hand, he points out that there is a goodly band of men of light and leading, who belong to different parties and different creeds, who have risked much, and in some cases suffered much, in order that justice may be done. We can only watch the great contest and trust that the right may at last conquer.—Mr. Andrew Lang gives an article on the idea of God among primitive peoples, and concludes, against the usually accepted teachings of authorities on the subject. His evidence tends to prove that the peoples alluded to have not derived their notions of a Supreme Being in the first place "from missionary teachings," but that a conception of deity far above the low "fetish" ideas generally taken as representing the bulk of their theology has developed amongst some of them at least, prior to the contact with civilised races.—Mr. Joseph Jacobs gives some "Recollections of Sir Edward Burne-Jones," revealing much that is attractive in the great artist. In Mr. Jacobs' opinion he ranks as the greatest "man" in art since Leonardo. We must not lay too much stress on the form, or perhaps even the matter, of some of the conversations alluded to; otherwise we should very deeply regret that such a "man" should have viewed the serious studies of the Higher Critics of the Scriptures as lacking in "reverence." Surely, he who loves truth so much that he dare even sacrifice his most cherished conceptions of the Bible rather than be unfaithful, is nearer to the true reverence than one who holds by the traditional thoughts simply because they impress his imagination. There is an iconoclastic spirit of criticism which exults in destructive analysis for its own sake; this we shall all do well to beware of. But the spirit that does not mind a thing being false so long as it is beautiful is that out of which are born not only bad theology, and bad morals, but, we think—pace all great artists who might seem to defend it—bad art also.

*The Foundations of England; or, Twelve Centuries of British History (B.C. 55—A.D. 1154). By Sir James H. Ramsay, of Bamf, Bart., M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. London: Swan Sonnenschein and Co, 2 vols, 24s.

The Contemporary contains much more attractive matter this month. Mr. William Clarke opens with a very thoughtful study of "Bismarck" as a prominent figure in the counter-revolution of the nineteenth century. We pass by Mr. Bennett's charges against the military in the late Soudan campaign—they are highly contentious, but so serious that we trust the most searching Parliamentary inquiry will be made into them. The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes's article on the new evangelical "Catechism" has been already noticed. It is not a very important statement in itself, and, if we may say so, it betrays the limitations of one who had certainly a prime part in the discussions of the compilers; but it supplies some interesting particulars as to the ideals and circumstances amid which the Catechism came to birth. Mr. Price Hughes admits that it was chiefly a "formula of peace" that was sought, and that elastic language was chosen deliberately. Nevertheless, he says, in another paragraph, one of the aims in view was to avoid "terms which involve risk of ambiguity and misapprehension." To be sure, this applies to "obsolete terms"—we should have thought any terms involving such a risk would be equally objectionable. He is very well pleased that a tertium quid has been found between Arminianism and Calvinism, and so may all philosophical theologians be, of his rank and order. We gather that he looks upon the "Ritschlian School" as "dangerous," but commends its noble conceptions of the wider Kingdom of God. At one time it was thought that an alternative answer would have to be devised on the subject of Baptism,—happily that catechetical freak was avoided. It was the resurrection of the body that gave the compilers most trouble—clearly a difficult question. By the bye, we observe that Mr. Price Hughes in the article claims some eighty millions of constituents and sympathisers, while in his Preface to the Catechism the figure is sixty millions. Generous margins, both in statistics and theological definitions, appear to be the order of the day. There are other noticeable articles, but we can only mention here Mr. Francis Peck's on "Sacerdotalism," and Professor Sully's quaint study of "Dollary."

The English Illustrated begins a new series, edited by Mr. Bruce S. Ingram. We confess that we prefer the beautiful black and white now produced to the colour-printing here attempted in some of the illustrations. The coloured fancy pictures in the Magazine of Art (Cassell's) are of the same kind, and are amusing, if nothing more.

Each truth is convictive of some error, and each truth helps on the discovery of another.—Benjamin Whichcote.

A TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

SIR,—In your issue of this week you invite expressions of opinion on the part of your readers on the subject of a large fund to be devoted to the high purposes for which the churches you so ably represent are founded, to be raised, if possible, by the commencement of the twentieth century.

You ask whether such a fund would be a blessing or a curse. I think the answer would be that it entirely depends upon the uses to which such a fund would be put. I cannot doubt that such a fund would be of very great service, and a blessing, especially if it were devoted to what seems, to me, to be the most urgent need of our little community of churches to-day, and that is the consolidation (if possible) and large increase of the funds for the augmentation of ministerial stipends.

To those who know what is going on in scores of the less wealthy congregations throughout the country, who know the depressing and anxious circumstances under which so many of our leaders and teachers have to work, it must be, and is, indeed, heartbreaking to think of the hardships patiently borne by those who are called upon week by week to give of themselves freely and without stint.

Again, it is certain that no course we could adopt would be more conducive to the growth of the principles we all have at heart than the encouragement and support of a body of educated, highly-trained, God-fearing ministers.

Manchester College exists to show how strongly successive generations have believed in this, down to our own day. The Home Missionary College is another evidence of the same desire.

The institutions are magnificent, and no teaching staff or appointments could more merit success; but how about the students? Are twenty-six students between the two institutions, studying for the ministry, a fair criterion of the desire on the part of the younger members and their parents to maintain this supply of leaders and teachers for the Free Christianity of the future?

But what, Sir, can you expect, when after a long course of training and considerable sacrifices on the part of parents and students, many years, perhaps a lifetime, must be passed on the salary of a second-rate clerk in a merchant's office?

I willingly admit that in cases where an overmastering desire to fill the high post of minister exists, these privations are willingly borne, but can any parent be blamed who refuses to adopt as a possible career for his sons a profession necessitating such constant anxiety and worry about money matters, and for the support of those who make home happy? I should dearly like to see one of my sons choosing what is, in my view, the noblest of all professions, but unless he show an early resolve to adopt it for himself at any cost how can I urge it?

I am afraid I have trespassed upon your space already at too great a length; it remains only for me to express the hope that the two funds which I notice stand together at about £72,000 (see "Essex Hall Year Book"), should be raised to £200,000, and that an effective scheme for raising all ministerial salaries at present below a reasonable amount should be adopted throughout the country. The fund could still be administered in the same way as at present—quietly, privately, at the discretion of the trustees—so that no congregation should feel that its duty was being undertaken for it.

Such an undertaking would be a glorious commencement for the twentieth century. May God grant it!—and He will if we will it.

THE MORAL IDEAL OF METHODISM.

SIR,—Will you allow me, as an ex-Methodist by birth, by education, and by consecration to the ministry, to make two remarks on a passage in Mr. Wood's interesting article on Dr. Dale, of Birmingham.

Mr. Wood speaks of "the Evangelical Revival of the last century in which Methodism was born." Would it not be more correct historically to say—"the Methodist revival from which Evangelicalism was born"? It seems to me that the founders of Methodism, both Arminian and Calvinistic, the Wesleys, Whitfield, and their co-workers, were the originators and not the products of Evangelicalism.

Mr. Wood says that Dr. Dale had the courage to point out that the Evangelical Revival in which Methodism was born "was especially defective in ethical directions. Too little thought had been given to character and conduct." I think such an assertion cannot fairly be made, without a good deal of qualification, with regard to the early Methodism to which it applies as well as to Evangelicalism in general. Methodism was not only a revival of certain religious doctrines or sentiments; it was even more distinctly an ethical revival. Everyone knows with what energy John Wesley preached repentance, conversion, sanctification, freedom from sin, Christian perfection. The "Rules of the Society of the people called Methodists" are predominantly moral. They declare that it is expected of all members of the Society that they should "evidence their desire of salvation, first, by doing no harm, by avoiding evil in every kind; secondly, by doing good, by being in every kind merciful after their power; as they have opportunity, doing good of every possible sort to all men." And in each case, a number of wrong actions to be avoided, and of right actions to be accomplished are given as examples.

Of course, our ethical views have somewhat changed, have grown deeper and broader. But was it not a most remarkable fact that in 1739 a religious society should be formed with rules of such a pre-eminently ethical nature? For my part, I have always been from my youth most strongly impressed by the ethical power of Methodism, and by its grand ideal of Christian Perfection; and when on completing my studies at the Free Church Theological School at Lausanne, I had to present a thesis in order to obtain my degree, I chose this very subject of entire sanctification. The change in my religious views has obliged me to break away from the Church of my youth, in which my father at the age of 86 is still an active minister. But the gratitude I shall ever feel for my moral training in Methodism has inspired this respectful criticism on certain expressions in Mr. Wood's article of last week.

THE PLEA FOR A MANUAL.

SIR,—Mr. Pike's letter in your issue of to-day states his view clearly, but it seems to me he has to add much to the expression to which I took exception in order to bear out his view. I would not, however, press this point, for it is not the letter but the spirit of the words quoted by Mr. Pike which should not, as I think, find its way into our prayers. All extreme self-abasement in prayer tends, as it seems to me, to paralyse healthy effort. What we want is encouragement in the right direction, and if, as we are always taught, the Heavenly Father is all-merciful and loving, where is the difficulty in lifting "up our face" to Him? It is no doubt right for those whose spiritual needs these services satisfy to continue to use them, but I and others are not amongst these. With regard to the forms for special occasions, I meant that I supposed any new manual that might be compiled would contain them—they might be copied from those printed with the Ten Services, if those be most approved. SPECIAL FUND FOR PROVIDING SUNDAY SCHOOLS WITH BOOKS.

SIR,—Will you kindly grant me space to acknowledge, on behalf of the Sunday School Association, the generous response which has been made by so many contributors to its appeal for support to this fund, which now amounts to nearly £340. It is not proposed to issue any further appeal before proceeding to apply the fund for the objects for which it has been raised, but if any others of our friends are intending to contribute, we shall be very glad to hear from them at an early date.

HELP THOU MY UNBELIEF.

BECAUSE I seek Thee not, O seek Thou me!

Because my lips are dumb, O hear the cry

I do not utter as Thou passest by,
And from my life-long bondage set me free!
Because content I perish, far from Thee,
O seize me, snatch me from my fate,
and try

My soul in Thy consuming fire! Draw nigh,

And let me blinded my salvation see.

If I were pouring at Thy feet my tears,
If I were clamouring to see Thy face,
I should not need Thee, Lord, as now I need,

Whose dumb, dead soul knows neither hopes nor fears,

Nor dreads the outer darkness of this place—

Because I seek not, pray not, give Thou heed!

OBITUARY.

MRS. DAVIS, OF EVESHAM.

FOR the sake chiefly of old Lancaster boys, to whom during their school-days she stood so truly in the place of mother, some few lines may here be devoted to the memory of Mrs. Davis, of whom we recorded last week that she had passed away at Almswood, Evesham, on the 11th inst., at the age of seventy-six.

A native of Oranienburg in Germany, Minna Grube was living at Jena at the time of her marriage to the Rev. David Davis. Brought up in a strictly Evangelical circle in the Lutheran Church, Mrs. Davis soon followed her husband, learning in the school of Channing thankfully to accept the spiritual faith of a Unitarian. One of the early religious impressions received by the writer of these lines is connected with the tone of her voice when years afterwards she once said: "Mr. Martineau is a prophet."

After seven years spent at Norwich, where there are still members of the Octagon Chapel who remember her husband's ministry there and her own part in it, she returned with him to Lancaster, where the first months of their married life had been spent, to undertake the charge of the school in which Mr. Davis had previously been partner with Mr. W. H. Herford. For twenty-seven years the school in Queen-square, known latterly as Castle Howell School, was her home, and the boys of succeeding generations know what she was to them.

When the school was given up, in 1888, Mr. and Mrs. Davis retired to his old home at Almswood, Evesham. Fifteen months ago he passed before her "into the world of light." She is the second Mrs. Davis of Almswood of whom it may be said that her children, and children's children, rise up to call her blessed.

In accordance with her own desire, her remains were taken last Saturday to Woking for cremation, and on the following Monday the ashes were laid in her husband's grave in the Evesham Cemetery.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL, OF GLASGOW.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL, the oldest Unitarian in Glasgow, and, we suppose in Scotland, passed on to the higher life on January 12, at the ripe age of eighty-seven. He carried on for many years the business of a carver and gilder, but had for a considerable time retired from business. In his early life he was connected with the Methodist body, but, becoming dissatisfied with orthodoxy, he for a time sympathised with Secularism. But being of a deeply religious nature he could not long rest in mere negations. In the Unitarian Church, St. Vincent-street, he found a spiritual home. When the Rev. John Page Hopps, in October, 1871, started a movement for a Unitarian church in the East-end of Glasgow, Mr. Russell gave this effort his most zealous support, and was for a short time treasurer to the new congregation under the ministry of the late Rev. William Mitchell. He has all along been a staunch upholder and most liberal subscriber to this church, to the Scottish Unitarian Association, and to Unitarian objects generally. Since 1871, up till his death, he has been constantly a member of the managing committee of South St. Mungo-street Church, a trustee, and a constant attender at the services, except when prevented by the state of his health. The last time he was able to be present was on the first day of this year. The success of his beloved church was ever near his heart, and he made many sacrifices on its behalf. He was greatly cheered by the revived prosperity of the church under its present pastor. He was a zealous believer in and upholder of Unitarian Christianity. He read widely and was specially interested in and conversant with religious and theological matters. Ever ready to relieve suffering and distress, few of his many deeds of charity met the public eye. He ever sought to follow in the footsteps of Jesus, his leader. His beloved wife had passed away twenty-eight years ago.

The funeral service was conducted at the residence of the deceased on Saturday last by the Rev. E. T. Russell. Appropriate references were also made at South St. Mungo-street at the services on the Sunday. He was a man who will be greatly missed, especially by the older church members who were so long his fellow-workers.

THE REV. FRANK P. SMEDLEY.

FRANK PERCIVAL SMEDLEY, of Rock Ferry, Liverpool, who died at San Francisco on Saturday, December 10, entered the Unitarian Home Missionary College in October, 1893, at the age of twenty. His college course, which was not without promise, was sadly broken by ill-health, and in the spring of 1896 he went to America, hoping to recover his strength. After a session at the Stamford University, he settled for a few months as minister at Santa Maria, in California, and again at Visalia, but his health remained uncertain, and he determined to return home on a sailing vessel. He reached San Francisco, but, while he was waiting to start on his homeward voyage, his illness returned in an aggravated form, and terminated fatally in less than a week.

Of Mr. Smedley the Rev. Dendy Agate writes:—"I came to know Frank Smedley intimately, and to have a real regard for him, during his last year or two in England, and I had a good deal to do with his going to America. I wish to take this opportunity of thanking the many friends here in England who made the voyage possible, and some of whom continued their help after he reached California. Nor should the kindness of many friends on the other side, especially of the Rev. C. W. Wendte, the Rev. Dr. Stebbins, and the ladies of the Channing Auxiliary, be unrecorded.

"I had many letters from him, and they bear testimony alike to the earnestness with which he threw himself into work and strove to master the problems of our time, and to the courage with which he faced the future. He had a simple and sustaining faith in God, and was resolved to devote himself to His service. Had he been spared to return to England and in restored health to take up ministerial labour here, he would have proved a sympathetic and able worker. What he did in connection with the Renshaw-street Domestic Mission during his student days in Manchester is still gratefully remembered there. There is real ability in one or two published sermons which reached me from the Far West, and, young as he was when the final summons came, he had suffered so much, and had had such varied experiences, keeping such a bright spirit through all, that I believe he would have been no unfit exponent of our Gospel to those who bear life's burden under our gloomier sky. His memory abides in the hearts of those who knew and loved him."

MR. JAMES STOATE.

THE death of Mr. James Stoate, of Bristol, on January 1, removes another figure well known in the circle of our Western churches, he having, in days gone by, preached as a layman in many of our pulpits.

Mr. Stoate took a great interest in the work of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, and also of the Lewin's Mead Boys' Sunday-school, where he at one time was superintendent.

The funeral, on January 7, was attended by many Unitarians and Freemasons, and at the burial-ground, Brunswick-square, the service was impressively read by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford. At the graveside were the Rev. Joseph Wain, Messrs. F. H. Vaughan, C. B. Gawler, W. C. Watkins (Secretary, Frenchay Chapel), W. G. Fry (Lewin's Mead Sunday-school).

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Strengthen the Defences.

ABOUT the year 390 before Jesus Christ was born, the town of Rome was very much smaller than it is now, and within the walls of the city were several hills, with temples and other buildings upon them. One of these hills was called the Capitol, and on the top of it were built some of the most important of all the Roman Temples—temples to their gods Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. The hill was very steep; on one side especially it was almost like a wall of rock, rising high above the walls of the city.

About the time I have mentioned, 390 years before the birth of Christ, the Gauls, who came from France (it was then called Gaul), and from parts of the country north and west of the mountains, had crossed first the Alps and then the Apennines, and were overrunning Italy, burning towns and driving out the inhabitants wherever they could conquer them; and at last they advanced on Rome itself, to try and gain possession of the chief city, with its temples and its wealth. The Romans had fought bravely to defend their city, but they had been conquered in many battles; and at last they found with grief and rage that even their beautiful and beloved city must be given up to the enemies, for they could no longer keep them out.

But the Capitol, the high and rocky hill with its buildings, still remained to them, and they determined to defend this, and with all their might, for they considered it the home of the true gods of Rome, and the citadel of the true Roman people; and if they could still keep the Capitol in their possession they would feel not altogether vanquished and undone. So they retired to the Capitol, resolved never to abandon it unless they should all die in the struggle. With enemies all round, and unable to get out, they could get no provisions or arms but what they had been able to take with them, so their case would soon become very serious. There was only one way up to the Capitol, and by this single approach the Gauls tried to storm the citadel; but the Romans beat them back with loss, and then the Gauls contented themselves with blockading the hill, and sending out part of their army over the country to fight and plunder all around.

Meantime some of the Romans had fled to a place called Veii, and they now wanted to communicate with their friends in the Capitol. A young man named Pontius Cominius, said that he would contrive to go and carry a message to and from the Capitol. He set out with his message, from Veii, and when he came to the River Tiber there was no bridge; so he swam through the river and crossed the level ground to the very foot of the steep wall of rock, which seemed quite impossible to climb. But at night, climbing by little ledges of rock, and holding by bits of grass and bushes, he got to the top, went into the citadel, saw the Roman friends there, delivered the message, and received an answer, and returned the same way that he had come, unhurt, and undiscovered by the Gauls.

But when morning came, the Gauls discovered by bits of broken rock, or shrubs, or little clumps of grass pulled down, that someone had climbed the rock, and that, therefore, it must be possible to do it. The place had been thought so impossible to climb that there was no wall at the top, and no guards had been put to guard that point; and though the messenger Pontius Cominius had been daring and clever enough to climb in by that way, the Romans thought that no one else knew it, and that no other person was in the least likely to try, least of all an army of men. But the Gauls determined to try; and when night came, they slowly, cautiously, and silently began to climb up, one behind another, by the tiny ledges and bushes, up the steep wall of rock. On they crept, climbing higher and higher; they were getting within a little space of the top; they would soon be able to step into the citadel, and, once in, they would surprise and massacre all who were there, and their victory would be complete.

Scarcely a sound did they make; no watchman heard them; all went well. When all at once a strange sound came to their ears from close above them, a loud discordant sound! Something had discovered them in spite of all their care and silence. What was it?

In the Temple of Juno were kept some geese, which were considered so sacred to the goddess that though the Romans had suffered sorely for want of food whilst shut up in the citadel, they had not killed these sacred birds; and the geese were now repaying their masters by saving them from their enemies. It was now all over with the climbing Gauls on their steep rock: the cackling, screaming geese with their flapping wings and their alarm and astonishment at the approaching enemies awoke Marcus Manlius, whose house was near the temple where the geese were kept. And we are told that "he sprang up, and seized his sword and shield and called his comrades and ran to the edge of the cliff. And behold a Gaul had just gained the top of the rock, when Marcus rushed upon him and dashed the rim of his shield into his face and tumbled him down the rock. The Gaul as he fell bore down those who were mounting behind him; and the rest were dismayed, and dropped their arms to cling more closely to the rock, and so the Romans, who had been roused by the call of Marcus," easily conquered them, and the Capitol was saved. "Then all so honoured the brave deed of Marcus Manlius, that each man gave him from his own scanty store one day's allowance of food."*

St. Paul says: "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty"; which might serve as a text to this story. Think of a flock of geese defeating one body of armed men, and awakening another body of armed men to their own defence! The Romans were called to look to their defences: at the very point where they thought themselves secure, and which they had left unguarded, the enemy was creeping in.

Children, here is a parable for you and me. The enemies creep in at what we think our safest place. We think: "I need not guard that place, it is perfectly secure." So thought Peter, when he said to Jesus: "Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended"; and Jesus said: "This night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice." Peter answered: "Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee." And it was when the cock crowed that he realised that he had done just what he said he never would do.

Will any cock crow for us before it is too late? Will any foolish geese cackle and flap a warning to us to beware, so that we may turn upon our enemy and cast him off from the entrance of our citadel? Do not our temptations creep upon us in the dark, like those climbing Gauls, when we have no idea that they are anywhere near? We must strengthen our defences, and not trust any place to chance, however impregnable we think it. Sentinels are wanted—brave and watchful soldiers who will not sleep at their post. And such sentinels we all have, if we will only employ them, and see that they are at their posts. If they are there, no climbing enemy will be able to enter. Watchful eyes will catch the first sight of them in the darkness, and waking ears will hear their creeping feet. Truth and honour, courage and steadfastness, patience, purity and love—these will be our sentinels and hold our citadel secure, if we set them to watch and guard every weak point.

TEACH THE CHILDREN.

THE new Evangelical Catechism, of which we collected some first impressions last week from a number of our friends, is issued with two avowed objects—(i.) to meet “the widespread growing demand for a modern manual in the much-needed catechetical instruction of our children”; and (ii.) to exhibit “the substantial agreement of the Evangelical Free Churches in relation to the fundamental and essential truths of Christianity.” Thus, while its first object is to meet the great need of the religious education of the young, it is, at the same time, a theological manifesto, and it was inevitable that on its first appearance that should be the point of view from which it was most eagerly scanned. Several of our friends pointed out last week the inconclusiveness of many of the theological statements in the Catechism and the decided marks of compromise which it bears. Indeed, that is the great achievement of the Catechism, and, perhaps, even justifies the very loud trumpet Mr. HUGH PRICE HUGHES has blown. We may certainly rejoice over the milder temper that is here displayed as “Evangelical” and the new stress laid on certain ethical elements in religion.

But we have been trying to realise what it would be to teach our children religion with the help of this Catechism, and it makes us very thankful that we are not obliged to be “Evangelical.” We prefer the religion of JESUS, and his method of gathering the children about him and laying his hands on them in blessing.

When JESUS began to talk to the children about religion, even to catechise them, to ask them questions and draw out answers from their young minds, can we imagine that he would wish at the outset to tell them that the Christian religion was something “founded” by himself? Would he not rather speak directly of the love and goodness of God, and the love and trust that must be in the children’s hearts, and of doing the FATHER’S will? And surely he would not puzzle their young minds by telling them that they were not able “of themselves” to love God and their neighbour. It is quite true, just as it is true that a child cannot draw a single breath “of himself,” but only by the grace of God. Yet no such thought should come in to stop our breathing, nor to interfere with the whole-hearted and direct endeavour to do the FATHER’S will. When JESUS blessed the little children he said, “Of such is the kingdom of God,” and surely his method is to encourage the love of goodness and the confidence that we can do the right, and not to try and convict the children of sin before their time. He would cast no baleful shadow of unreal doctrine between the little ones and their FATHER in heaven. They are to love God and goodness, and to do the right in the power of that love, without any morbid thought of a corrupted will. To overlay the simplicity of a child’s moral nature with even the mildest form of the evangelical scheme of salvation seems to us entirely contrary to the mind of CHRIST. Instead of the answer in the Catechism to the question, “How did the Son of God save his people from their sins?” recounting the accepted items of the Creed, it would seem to us more in keeping with the method of JESUS to let the children grow familiar with the parable of the Prodigal Son, to let them understand that while “of ourselves” we are not able to cleanse our own hearts, the FATHER’S forgiving love will enfold the penitent, and in the lowly service of the FATHER’S house he will be brought back to the child-like mind, and his heart will be made pure again.

We must not leave the impression on our readers that the healthier elements of religion are not present in many of the answers of the Catechism. It is an immense gain that the children will learn from the first that JESUS taught us to call God “Our heavenly Father,” and that alone, and in prayer to speak to Him, and to none other. But the elements of “Evangelical” doctrine are all present side by side with this, so that there is no spiritual unity in the Catechism. While the doctrine is not taught directly as necessary for salvation, “the mystery of the blessed Trinity” is there, to bring confusion to the child’s mind, and in answer to the preceding question, he has been taught that JESUS now carries on his work of salvation “by the third person in the blessed Trinity, the Holy Spirit, who was sent forth at Pentecost.” This is the first mention of the Trinity, at Question 18, whereas the child learnt at the beginning what JESUS taught concerning God.

It may well be that many of the “sixty millions” for whom this Catechism is provided, having learnt with JESUS to love the FATHER and trust in Him, will be completely satisfied with the fulness of that spiritual faith, and will not attempt to burden their children’s minds with the subsequent doctrine of the Trinity, and when they come to the sentence about “the secret power of the Holy Spirit working graciously in our hearts” they will make it clear that this is indeed the source of all religion, not as any “third person,” but the indwelling of our FATHER Himself, from whose presence we can never go, whose love enfolds His children for ever, and is the Giver of all our good.

The natural beginning of religion for the children is in obedience and in the love and trust of the home. It is not doctrines that they need, but the love of persons, the love of the FATHER in heaven, and the love of JESUS as Friend and Teacher. In the new Catechism, while there are many opportunities for those who use it to make the power of their religion felt, there is, to our mind, too little of JESUS himself, and too much doctrine, to make it what it should be, really to help the children.

HOLY MEMORIES.

HER still and quiet life flowed on
As meadow streamlets flow,
Where fresher green reveals alone
The noiseless ways they go.

Her path shall brighten more and more Unto the perfect day;
She cannot fail of peace who bore
Such peace with her away.

O sweet, calm face, that seemed to wear
The look of sins forgiven!
O voice of prayer, that seemed to bear
Our own needs up to heaven!

How reverent in our midst she stood,
Or knelt in grateful praise!
What grace of Christian womanhood
Was in her household ways!

For still her holy living meant
No duty left undone;
The heavenly and the human blent
Their kindred loves in one.

She kept her line of rectitude
With love’s unconscious ease:
Her kindly instincts understood
All gentle courtesies.

The dear Lord’s best interpreters
Are humble human souls:
The Gospel of a life like hers
Is more than books or scrolls.

From scheme and creed the light goes out,
The saintly fact survives;
The blessed Master none can doubt
Revealed in holy lives.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

The Annual General Meeting of Trustees was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, January 12, the President, Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH, in the chair, and subsequently, the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

The Annual Address of the Committee, which had been previously circulated, was taken as read, and after explanation and emendation was adopted.

The Address, having borne testimony to the ability and devotion of the Principal and other members of the Teaching Staff, recorded the death during the year of a number of supporters of the College, recounting the resolution passed by the Committee on the death of Mr. Thomas Ashton (published at the time in these columns) and also the following resolution passed on the death of Mr. Russell Martineau:—

That it is with profound regret that the Committee record the death of Mr. Russell Martineau, a Trustee since 1858, and Lecturer on Hebrew Language and Literature from 1857 to 1866, and Professor in the same Chair from 1866 to 1874. That the Committee recognise, with grateful affection for his memory, the invaluable services he rendered to the College and its Students by his careful and accurate Oriental scholarship and his conscientious devotion to the duties of his Chair, winning the esteem and respect of pupils, whose sorrow is joined to that of the Committee in losing one who was so fine an example of diligence in the search for truth, and whose character endeared him to all who fell under its influence.

That the Committee desire to convey to Mrs. Martineau their most respectful sympathy in her bereavement, and that to this message of heartfelt condolence with the widow, they add the expression of their deep grief that so sad a loss has befallen the revered father of Mr. Martineau.

Having noted various points in connection with the work of the College, the Committee, expressed their sense of the great value of the advice and counsel of the Teaching Staff, with their more intimate acquaintance with the conditions under which the College is placed in its new home, and continued:—

In his termal report for Hilary Term, the Principal informed the Committee of various matters of interest as to the work of the College, recording a fair amount of Sunday engagements for the Students, and their readiness to give voluntary help on Sundays in the Charles-street Institute at Oxford; also that, as a result of criticisms on the aims and methods of the College at one of the meetings of the Discussion Society, he prepared a Course of Ten Lectures for the Summer Term on "Studies in Doctrinal Theology." The report further stated that the Martineau Club continued to hold its meetings, at one of which a most interesting paper was read by Professor Gardner on "The Evangelists considered as Literary Men"; and a public lecture was delivered by Mr. Nagarkar on "The Work of Hindu Social Reform in the Brahma Somaj," before a fairly large and very appreciative audience; and that Mr. Odgers delivered three public lectures on "Some Aspects of the Later Paganism," with illustrations thrown upon the screen from inscriptions and monuments, to audiences the quality of which was good.

In his report for the Michaelmas Term, just concluded, the Principal refers to a very pleasant event in the course of the term, in an invitation given by the Students of Manchester College to the Students of Mansfield College to dine with them in Hall. It was cordially accepted, and twenty-two of the Mansfield men came, and a very friendly evening was spent. A further item recorded by the Principal, which the Committee hail with satisfaction, is that of Mansfield men occasionally taking the Evening Service at the Charles-street Institute.

The Martineau Club had held two meetings, at one of which Mr. Pal gave a long discourse on "The Religion of the Bhagavadgita" and at the other of which Mr. F. C. Conybeare very kindly read a learned paper on "The History of Christmas."

The Address then referred in the following terms to the retirement of Mr. Harry Rawson from the position of Chairman of Committee:—

Mr. Rawson having retired from the office of Chairman of the Committee, held by him by annual appointment for many years, with the ever increasing respect and affection of his colleagues, they could not allow him to leave the Chair, in which he had so long presided over their counsels, without recording, by a resolution, their deep gratitude for services marked by strict impartiality, unflinching courtesy, and great business ability, while they further gave expression to their sense of the peculiar grace and unerring judgment with which on many important occasions he had been called to act as Representative of the Executive of the College.

The Committee esteem themselves fortunate that they have induced Mr. Steintal, with his long experience on their Board, and his lifelong sympathy with the College, to return to a Chairmanship previously held by him with honour to himself and benefit to his colleagues.

In regard to the teaching arrangements of the College, the re-appointment of the Rev. Joseph Wood as Tate Lecturer on preaching and pastoral work was noted, and the appointment of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed as Dunkin Lecturer for the session 1898-99, whose subject is: "The Principles of Human Conduct as illustrated in Commercial and Industrial affairs." The Address also referred to the very great regret with which the Committee had received the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's resignation of his position as Vice-Principal and Lecturer on the Old Testament and Comparative Religion. They felt it impossible to speak fittingly of Mr. Carpenter's work in the College, and of his personal influence over the students. The reasons urged by Mr. Carpenter for the step taken were such that the Committee had felt obliged to accept the resignation, and could only wish him God-speed in that literary work to which he felt it right to devote his main energies. They expressed a hope, however, that it might be arranged for Mr. Carpenter to retain a lectureship on Comparative Religion, and to continue his services on the Board of Studies.

The Committee had been singularly fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. W. E. Addis, M.A., as Mr. Carpenter's successor in the chair of Old Testament Language and Literature, the appointment to date from June, 1899.

The Address concluded with an appeal to the friends of the College, for gifts to it not only beautiful in art and large in material resource, but still more precious—the gift of lives devoted to the principles it holds dear, and most of all the gift of young lives sent out from households full of its spirit, to be dedicated to the ministry of a gospel "free as the breath of heaven and devout with the spirit of Christ."

The Treasurer, Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, pointed out that while the receipts for the year nearly covered expenses (the deficiency being only £1 0s. 7d.), this was due to an unusual decrease in expenses, in exhibitions to students, and other items. The gross deficiency stood at £673 11s. 9d. The Chapel account was still unsatisfactory, and he thought that if the endowment could not be increased, the expenses should be cut down to the limit of the income of the present fund, which was £322.

Special reports were also presented on the College Regulations and on the scheme for a Students' Residence in connection with the College.

In the course of a full discussion of the latter report, the Treasurer assured the meeting that the scheme could be tried experimentally for a few years without financial risk to the College, and the report embodying the recommendations of the Committee was ultimately adopted by a large majority.

The officers and Committee were re-appointed, the former being Mr. David Ainsworth, President. Dr. Martineau, Sir Henry Tate, Bart., and Mr. Arthur Greg, Vice-Presidents. Mr. Charles W. Jones, Treasurer. The Rev. H. E. Dowson and Mr. A. H. Worthington, Secretaries.

ENGLISH PRESBYTERIANS AND UNITARIANS.

THE fifth of a series of Sunday evening lectures on "Christian Churches of England" delivered in Unity Hall, Torquay, by the Rev. Priestley Prime, was on "English Presbyterians and Unitarians." Having said at the outset that the people of whom he was to speak were little known and little understood, Mr. Prime proceeded:—

"It is difficult to name them correctly, since they did not wish to be a sect, and did not wish to be separated from other Christians who differed from them on doctrinal points. They wished to be considered as 'mere Christians,' followers of Jesus who guarded for themselves and permitted and recommended to others the right to form their religious opinions in accord with their own insight; nay, further, nothing seemed to them more imperative, more distinctly the duty of man, than to be true to his own conscience, and use his own reason in religious matters.

"These men were among those who seceded from the Church of England, when the Act of Uniformity in 1662 made subscription to a large number of doctrines and consent to the Prayer-Book, a condition of continuance in the Church. They desired to belong to the Church, but could not conscientiously declare their belief in these many articles and creeds. They objected to the division of Christians into sects, believing that the Church ought to permit liberty of conscience to all; but since the Church imposed doctrines as a condition of fellowship and they did not believe some of these doctrines, they were forced to leave it rather than solemnly tell a lie.

"Having been expelled in this way, some of the clergy, thus persecuted, earned their living by teaching, or in other professions, some engaged in husbandry, some continued to preach, forming congregations among those laymen who with them had seceded from the Church for conscience' sake. Such was the extent of the persecution to which they and other dissenters were subjected, that they were speedily prevented from meeting in public, and their religious history was in secret, save when they were brought before the justices, imprisoned, fined, and otherwise molested for holding religious meetings. When William of Orange brought toleration, they emerged from obscurity, formed anew societies which had been broken up or hidden by persecution, but still affirmed that they desired union with the Church and that their organisations were not intended to prejudice any scheme of larger comprehension such as they hoped for. When they built their meeting-houses for worship they did not tie them down by any close trust-deed requiring that their peculiar opinions should be for ever taught by those who ministered and worshipped there. They dedicated them to the worship of Almighty God and the service of humanity, to be used for that purpose in such ways as the congregation should from time to time determine. Themselves excluded and persecuted, they refrained from excluding and persecuting others. Claiming for themselves the right of private judgment in religious matters, they left the way free for others, their contemporaries and descendants, to judge for themselves. Recognising the supremacy of conscience, they laid no snares for the consciences of others. So great a confidence in God and the future I have found among no other religious body. They were called Presbyterians, but they never subscribed to the Westminster Confession; and though they were inclined to the Presbyterian form of church government they were never so strictly organised as the Scotch Presbyterians. Their development was widely different from these, and I am personally in doubt whether the name English Presbyterian is a fitting designation, for I find that they did not insist on the Presbyterian organisation nor carry it out completely, that in the West, at least, of which I know most, they did not exclude Independents from their assembly, that a leading member of the Exeter Assembly wrote an urgent pamphlet desiring the Baptists not to separate from them on account of an opinion which they would be allowed to hold and observe without secession, if only they would permit others who did not agree with them in this matter, the like liberty to baptise as they thought right. In early days the assemblies of their ministers were called 'The United Brethren,' and neither by their name nor their constitution did they exclude any minister who was morally and intellectually capable. These assemblies of ministers were not, strictly speaking, Synods after the Presbyterian model, but they gave advice to the congregations about the appointment of ministers and other matters, and they educated young men for the ministry.

"Undoubtedly these people held the doctrine of the Trinity, but they did not organise with that doctrine as a basis of fellowship. After a while, when Unitarian opinions began to be frequent, an effort was made to prevent them from being taught in their pulpit by means of the power resting in the ministers' assemblies of recommending some men and not recommending others when a vacancy occurred. But when it became customary to put doctrinal questions to candidates, and make consent to the doctrine of the Trinity a condition of their recommendation to a congregation, a strong feeling grew up against this practice, and in 1718 in the Devonshire Assembly, and about the same time elsewhere entirely abolished it, after it had been usual for only a few years. The chief movers in favour of freedom were not themselves Unitarians.

"The way being open for development, both in the Churches and in the ministers' assemblies, Unitarian opinions became frequent, and at last general among them, as they could not, in the creed-bound Churches, save by subterfuge and equivocation. But these Churches did not, and could not, rightly or legally make Unitarianism compulsory in their congregations any more than their Trinitarian ancestors had enjoined Trinitarian belief.

"The great majority of so-called Unitarian Churches in England are not rightly called Unitarian, because, whatever the opinions prevalent among the present members, the very constitution of the church and the trust deeds of its buildings require freedom for development, and in whatever direction the society moves in opinion and genuine development, it has the right to move secured to it, so long as it does not give up the purpose of worshipping God and serving man. That those Churches which have been free have nearly all become Unitarian is an argument for the truth of Unitarianism: but it would not be a justification for labelling the buildings and societies Unitarian. Many churches and meeting-houses have been built since the general opinion among these free churches has been Unitarian in theology. Some few of these are tied down to Unitarianism: but nearly all express the same faith in God's continual guidance and universal Fatherhood which their ancestors held, and express it in the same way by open trusts, and the basis of fellowship which excludes no one who sympathises with their object of worship of God and service of man.

"Unitarians are not ashamed of their Unitarianism, but they hold it of less importance than sincerity of conviction, the pure search for truth, the honesty of action in accord with conviction. They would force none to be Unitarians, put no premium upon opinion of one kind or another. Honesty and love and faithfulness are paramount. Therefore, while some of them say, 'Seeing that the public fasten upon us this name "Unitarian," let us accept it, and import into it all the ideas of freedom, which are really general among us'; others, of whom I am one, cannot do violence to the etymology of words, and the history of doctrine in this way. We affirm that while we may most of us be Unitarian in theological opinion we hold Christianity to be a wider principle; we do not want to shut ourselves up with those only whose opinions are like our own. We believe in the fellowship of the spirit, deeper and more real and permanent than any doctrine. It is largely a matter of words with us; we are, I believe, nearly all united in welcoming all who wish to join us in prayer, and to be helpful, whatever their theology: and I, your minister, though I am willing to say, if need be, what I now believe, have never promised to restrict the future in myself or others to the measure of present knowledge or insight; and I have not met a fellow-minister in our group of churches who has thus bartered away the freedom of the spirit. God was with our fathers; God is here; God will guide our children. Our best service to men and women is to lead them to seek Him and follow His guidance rather than ours."

NOTES FROM AUSTRALIA.

THE movements of religious thought under the Southern Cross are neither swift nor strong, but rather feeble echoes of far-distant voices; hence such motion as there is seems a little belated and without vivacity. Church life here appears to lack that intellectual keenness and moral and spiritual earnestness with which one is familiar in England. This may be due in part to isolation, and in part also to the different mental atmosphere of these new lands, where the absence of the old associations have not yet been compensated by the birth of new and strong attachments that can supply their place. In the meantime church life generally is a good deal depressed, because a very large part of young Australia is not greatly concerned about its religious life.

At the recent gathering of the Presbyterians of Victoria something like a general failure of the Church was frankly admitted by the Moderator, and it was publicly stated that 40,000 Presbyterians do not attend church at all. Some 1,600 return themselves as Unitarians in the census, and of this number about 600 reside in Melbourne and suburbs, but you would hardly think this credible if you turned into our church on a Sunday morning. I have no other statistics to hand, but am informed that all the Churches, with the possible exception of the Roman Catholic, are in much the same deplorable condition.

During this last week or two the Church, in one or two of its branches, has been a good deal before the public. First, the Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly in dealing with the facts of the situation, ventured to suggest a new creed as the most efficient means to restore the Church to its lawful place in the affections of the people; but the suggestion appears to have been received with a chilling indifference, not having provoked even opposition. The substance and point of this new creed lie in its first article: "We believe in Jesus Christ, and worship Him as Lord and King"; then follows an adoption of the Apostles' Creed, with the first clause omitted, some sentences from the Gospels, and a final section on the nature of the Church. The suggestion was to the effect that this creed be used in religious worship and recited by the people while the Westminster Confession was kept in the background for the use of the initiated. But apparently it has not "caught on." The Bishop of Ballarat, Dr. Thornton, provoked a storm of angry protest by his address from the chair of the Church Congress just concluded in that famous city. Beneath a slight veneer of respectability and public decency, "Australian life was stained deep with intemperance, profanity, and lust, even—it was terrible to record—among children." This grave charge levelled against a whole people is surely false and calculated to convey a very erroneous impression of the conditions of public life, and is, therefore, unjust as well as ungenerous, and the Bishop ought to have been more discriminating in his rebuke when his words might have had a more beneficial effect; as it is they have deepened the sense of hostility to the Church. Australians are naturally very proud of their country and their achievements during the last half century or so, and resent angrily such unfair wholesale charges as this. But the more thoughtful part of the community are by no means blind to the very serious evils that do exist, and are anxious and eager to check, if they cannot uproot them.

There is a prospect of a little mild excitement over a new book which the Rev. S. H. Ferguson, a Presbyterian minister in one of the suburbs, has published. The Argus, in its short notice of it, has sounded a note of alarm which will probably be re-echoed along the line. The title of the book, which has little relation to its contents, is "Spiritual Law Through the Natural World." Its purpose is "to expose errors in popular theology by laying them open to the clear light of reason and the Word of God"; the most favourable view of it can hardly say that it is even moderately successful in its aim. But judged by the Westminster standard it must be declared heretical. It will be interesting to see how the Assembly will deal with this vigorous attempt to shake off traditional authority in the Presbyterian Church.

I am not the proper person to speak of our Church, its condition and prospects in this city, but I hope in a week or two to be able to report from observation of our churches at Hobart, Auckland, and Sydney.

NOTES FROM MADRAS.

Madras, December 29.

Two months of the rainiest and of the sunniest weather known to Madras. I arrived during the rainy season, and for a fortnight the floodgates of heaven were opened, and the rain poured down, hour after hour, in torrents. The roads were flooded, the water reaching to the level of the door of one's "gharry." A deep stream ran down the Broadway. At times the electric tram-cars were compelled to cease running; and at other times their passengers were carried to and fro on the backs of coolies. The river Cooum rose rapidly, and its somewhat malodorous bed and banks have been temporarily cleansed by the inundation. The whole town was deluged.

In the middle of November a welcome change came; and for two weeks the days were resplendent. Then seven days of torrential rains, followed by a return of Eastern splendour, which still continues to shed its glory around us. I have seen Madras, I am told, at its worst in drenching rain, at its best in brilliant sunshine. (May is characterised as the worst month in the year, when the city is wrapped in a suffocating "muggy" atmosphere. August, as a rule, is like a furnace of sevenfold heated fire.)

Madras is justly proud of several of its buildings—the Presidency College and Senate House, the High Courts of Justice, the Museum and Connemara Library, the Victoria Hall, the new premises of the Madras Bank, the palatial shops in the Mount-road, owned and managed, mainly, by Europeans. Popham's Broadway is the central quarter for the native merchants, but I am told that it is declining in commercial activity, wealthy purchasers preferring the more spacious premises and the more abundant variety of goods to be found in the Mount-road. Still, Popham's Broadway shows signs of business activity, and though it may have lost, or may be losing, its supremacy as a centre of trade, it will not be for a long time without the favour of Dame Fortune. The Marina is the "Rotten Row" of Madras, and here, every fine evening, from about 5.30 to 7.30, "those who compose the feathery foam of fashion," may be seen riding or driving. Here, too, as well as on the beach, and in the People's Park, military bands play two or three times a week. Madras is thus not without relief to what some of its own inhabitants describe as its intolerable monotony and dulness.

The streets of the city do not, to a European, justify this condemnation. The diverse costumes he sees are to him, at least, entertaining. They are of every variety, from the free light, and airy garments of those who in the Western world would be considered in a disgracefully undressed condition, to the habiliments of those who have adopted the outfit of an Englishman, excepting his hat. They are of every colour, ranging from all white on one person, through gradations of hue on others, to the mingling of all the rainbow tints on still others. In nearly all cases they are artistically arranged and present a decidedly picturesque effect. Go round the bazaars when the sun is resplendent, and the natives are about in thousands, and the kaleidoscopic changes, from figures in full dress to figures in half dress, to figures with only a parti-coloured cloth about the loins, are delightful. How long this endless variety of colour is to continue is a question exercising the minds of a good many who wish the old, old fashion of gay clothes and bright jewels maintained. But changes are taking place among the educated. The South Indian Brahmin, conservative as he is, is often seen habited as an Englishman. The Sudra and the Protestant Native Christian male adopt European fashions. The Native Christian women, recruited from all kinds of Indian communities, lose their old diversity of garment by arraying themselves in full skirt, jacket with leather or silver belt, straw hat, stockings, and shoes, à la European. A writer in a late issue of the Madras Mail laments these changes, and sorrowfully predicts that they will go on until "picturesque Oriental Madras fifty years hence will probably, as far as costume is concerned, rather choose its habiliments from Bond-street than from the Big Bazaar or Chandi Chowk."

In the suburbs of Madras, where the local aristocracy reside, there are spacious, here and there, princely bungalows in enormous compounds. Near to my temporary quarters are the Poonamallee-road, and within easy walking distance, Nungumbakum. In both of these districts are handsome houses in extensive grounds. The last-named place, in the size of its bungalows and the area of its compounds, is outdone only by Adyar. Of all the localities surrounding Madras Adyar takes the cake. In spaciousness its houses remind one of Chatsworth or Eaton Hall, and they stand in the midst of acres of well-wooded and richly-flowered parks. At the time of writing, the Annual Convention of the Theosophical Society is being held in Adyar, and it will give you some idea of Adyar bungalows if I mention that the hall in Colonel Olcott's will accommodate 1,600 persons, and quite that number of people have travelled from all parts of Madras on four consecutive mornings to listen to four lectures by Mrs. Besant. One criticism, by the way, which I have heard on these lectures is that Mrs. Besant gratifies the pride of her phenomenal audiences by glorifying Hinduism and the India of the past instead of addressing to them wholesome words of counsel for the religious and social needs of to-day.

From Adyar to Blacktown—what a contrast! Blacktown, in the centre of the city, is the Whitechapel of Madras, only more so! There seem to be concentrated in it, in an intensified form, all the conditions that make for disease. Fortunately, the preventive measures of the Municipal Commission are so efficient that there has not been a single indigenous case of plague in Madras. The very few cases imported from Bangalore have been at once effectively dealt with. But it is the opinion of competent authorities that, should this fell enemy of life appear in Blacktown, whole masses of the population there would be swept away in a few weeks. May no such awful calamity befall it!

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

WE have not had quite so much excitement in Manchester this winter as we had last—no grand bazaar to work for and at, no counting up of proceeds. We have been supposed to have been engaged devising means of spending the large sum of money then obtained. Certainly the Committee of the District Association have been much occupied in their endeavours to faithfully discharge the responsibilities attaching to the proper employment of nearly £10,000. Sums of money have been voted to various local churches which have on hand schemes of building and redemption of mortgage which are worthy of support. Blackley wants a new school as badly as any place I know. The present building is poor and inadequate in every respect, and the folk there are striving to raise the necessary funds for a more convenient structure, but they do not intend to be saddled with a mortgage. The Association has also helped Swinton to create a trust fund for the purpose of covering the yearly chief rent; and also Pendleton has received assistance in its effort to clear off a mortgage of £800.

Oldham-road has been helped to clear off a deficit which had accumulated in connection with repairs, &c.; and a grant has been made to Dob-lane towards necessary alterations and improvements in the chapel and school building. The main expenditure, however, is to be in connection with the Forward Movement Churches at Chorlton, Heaton Moor, Urmston, and Bradford. We have discovered that many considerations preclude the hasty erection of church buildings. It is not an easy matter to drop upon the right plot of land all at once. Then the garment has to be cut according to the cloth—an operation requiring no small amount of skill. A site is secured at Chorlton; but the folk there are desirous of having a building which will cost a little more money than they have in hand, and so they are waiting a while before commencing operations; for one of the conditions which the Association has laid down is that no mortgage shall ever be allowed on the Forward Movement properties. The plans indicate not only an architecturally pleasant building, but also one which provides for present needs and future development. At Urmston and Bradford sites have also been secured, and building will begin in a week or two at the former place; while in connection with the latter, plans are at present under careful consideration. Chorlton has now a minister of its own in the person of the Rev. James Ruddie, late of Accrington; while the Rev. Priestley Prime is expected to commence duties early in April as resident missionary at Heaton Moor, having charge for the present also of Urmston. The Rev. W. E. Attack has been settled at Bradford now nearly a year, and the work has prospered greatly in his hands. At Heaton Moor there is no immediate intention to launch a building scheme; but the folk there are hopeful that, under Mr. Prime's ministry and leadership, a church of their own will soon become a necessity. We have opened up no new ground this last year, because the task of consolidating has engrossed all our attention and resource; still, I question whether anyone could be found to deny the need of still further extension of our Forward Movement work within the Manchester District.

It might reasonably have been supposed that no Unitarian bazaar could possibly hope to be a success within two or three years of our united effort in 1897; and yet our friends at Oldham realised £800, though wanting only £500, and our Pendleton friends also realised about £500 at their recent bazaars respectively. There are other bazaars and sales of work spoken of, and so we go on, finding that there is really no end to folk's generosity when the cause is a good one. The friends at Middleton, who a few years ago erected their new and convenient school-chapel, are now bent upon obtaining a really first-rate organ; already liberal donations have been promised by church members, and the Association has made a grant from its ordinary funds, and I believe the date is fixed for the opening of this new instrument.

Within the last few months the Rev. W. Holmshaw has settled as minister at Blackley, and thus far has made an excellent impression. There is life and spirit about the place, auguring well for its future prosperity. The Rev. W. E. George, M.A., also has settled as the minister at Swinton, and the folk there are rallying round him in their characteristically loyal way. Indeed, taking it all round, the denominational life of the district is in a hopeful state; and I trust that the contemplated bazaar in London will do as much in the way of rousing interest and enthusiasm amongst London Unitarians as our bazaar has done amongst us.

Unfortunately for many months past we have missed Mr. James R. Beard, who was the genius of the Manchester bazaar, from our Committee meetings. He has been seriously ill, as everyone knows, and he himself can never realise how anxiously and universally inquiry has been made at every meeting held as to his condition of health. A grave crisis has been passed through, but we are all now rejoiced to learn that his ultimate recovery is merely a matter of time, and we are looking forward earnestly to the time when we shall again have the value of his counsel and the inspiration of that enthusiasm which is peculiarly his. We trust that his old strength may wholly return to him, and that he may be spared many years to engage in that voluntary labour he so much loves. It will always be a regret to us that his breakdown in health has prevented him from taking part in those deliberations which were for the purpose of carrying to completion a scheme which he mainly initiated.

The Manchester Domestic Mission has recently been passing through a period of stress and difficulty. Somehow or other, for years past the leakage of membership from death and other causes has not been made good; and it seemed to be suddenly realised that its expenditure was largely exceeding its income. The condition of affairs was indeed very serious, although no institution in this great city is doing a grander or more necessary work. The Mission is mainly supported by individuals and churches who are professedly Unitarian, yet it is wholly and advisedly unsectarian in its aims and work. An earnest endeavour has been made to re-awaken generous interest in its behalf, and the result is an added membership sufficient to carry it over its present difficulty. Still further financial support, however, is needed if it is to accomplish all the good work possible for it to do; and it is to be hoped, therefore, that in the future its subscription list will not only be maintained, but considerably increased. An advertisement in another column announces the fact that Mr. John Harwood is giving a recital in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Monday, January 23, the proceeds of which are to be handed over to the Mission funds.

Although Bolton is outside of this Manchester district so-called, yet it is so close that we were stirred by the enthusiastic spirit which characterised the autumnal meeting of the B. and F. Association, held in that town. Bolton is too independent to be flattered by Manchester patronage; but it must be said that we were proud of the way in which our Bolton friends carried out their work, and of the success which they most deservedly achieved. We have a high opinion of Bolton folk, and believe they can achieve anything they set their hearts on; and if anyone ever doubted this, he must have changed his mind after seeing the grand audience in the Town Hall on the most inclement night we have experienced this winter. The fact is, we have quite as much enthusiasm as the rest of Christians when occasion calls it forth; and if these great and exceptional occasions could come a little oftener, it would be all the better for us individually, and also for the great cause we have at heart.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Banbury.—On Monday and Tuesday, Jan. 9 and 10, the annual New Year's parties were held in connection with the Christchurch Chapel Sunday-school. On Monday evening the usual entertainment, with a good programme, was given. The minister (the Rev. H. Hill) occupied the chair. There was a good attendance of friends present. At the conclusion of the programme, gifts of clothing were given out to the scholars by Mr. and Mrs. Hill.

Again Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cobb, of Lewes, sent an excellent parcel of warm clothing for the children, as well as other helps for the school. A few other friends kindly helped in various ways. On Tuesday the scholars, parents, and friends had their usual tea, the evening being spent in recreation, games, &c.

Carlisle.—Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, who is at present studying at Manchester College, Oxford, preached here on the 15th inst. In the morning he delivered a masterly and eloquent discourse on "Where is thy God?" In the evening his lecture on "England's Responsibilities to India" was listened to with rapt attention by a congregation that filled the church, and evoked enthusiasm that often showed itself in suppressed applause. On the following evening Mr. Pal lectured on "The Problem of Temperance in India." Despite wretched weather there was a good attendance.

Cullumpton.—The annual winter treat of the Sunday-school was held on Jan. 6. Tea was followed by a magic-lantern, shown by Mr. Endicott, of Plymouth, and the evening was enjoyed by children and elders alike. On Jan. 11 the children and teachers gave an entertainment, after which prizes were distributed.

Doncaster.—The annual tea of the Sunday-school and Band of Hope was held in the large Co-operative Hall on Jan. 4. The evening's entertainment consisted of a children's operetta, successfully given by the scholars, entitled Madam Muddle's Dream, published by Curwen and Sons. Last Tuesday the Rev. H. and Mrs. Thomas were "at home" to the congregation, and on the following day entertained the Sunday-school scholars and teachers, together with the members of the Band of Hope and all children connected with the congregation.

Glasgow.—The third of the series of social parlours, organised by the Ladies' Guild of the South St. Mungo-street Church, was held on Tuesday week. A large and enthusiastic company of members and friends was present, and thoroughly enjoyed the songs and readings which were rendered during the evening. These social parlours, besides bringing the members into more intimate connection with each other, are admirably adapted for the introduction of strangers, who are speedily made to feel at home.

Glasgow: All Souls' Church.—The inaugural soirée in connection with this church was held in the Lesser Dixon Hall, Crosshill, on the evening of Jan. 16, the Rev. J. M. Connell presiding. After tea an excellent programme of music and recitations was gone through, and speeches were delivered by the minister, Mr. James Graham, president of the Scottish Unitarian Association; Mr. Wm. Wilson, the secretary of the church; and Mr. Jas. Bannatyne, the treasurer. Mr. Graham, in the course of a vigorous and inspiring address, expressed his personal sympathy with the principles and ideals of the church, and pointed out the great responsibilities as regards character and conduct which the church, in standing for the spirit of religion rather than for a particular creed, imposed on its members. There was a large attendance, and a most enjoyable and encouraging evening was spent.

Horsham.—The Christmas festival of the Sunday-school was held on Jan. 12, when, after an address by the Rev. J. J. Marten, prizes for the year were distributed by Mrs. Marten, and a successful entertainment followed.

Horwich.—Prizes were distributed in the Sunday-school last Monday by Mrs. H. Harwood, in the absence of Mrs. Smithells, who had generously provided them for the scholars. The Rev. R. C. Moore stated that the prospects for the year were most encouraging.

Ilminster.—A congregational tea, followed by a public meeting, in recognition of the recent settlement of the new minister, the Rev. E. Parry, took place at the Old Meeting on Thursday, Jan. 12. More than a hundred friends sat down to tea, after which Colonel M. L. Blake took the chair, supported by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, Jeffery Worthington, T. B. Broadrick, E. S. Anthony, and E. Parry, together with Messrs. M. B. Baker and J. C. Conway. The Ilminster Orchestral Band having played a selection, the Chairman read letters of apology for non-attendance from the Revs. H. S. Solly, Charles C. Coe, W. P. Duke (Congregationalist), and W. Fyche (Wesleyan, Ilminster), and a telegram from the Rev. S. S. Brettell regretting that he and his friends at Crewkerne had been prevented by the tempestuous weather from joining so interesting a gathering. Having earnestly and appropriately set forth the object of the meeting, the Chairman called on Mr. M. B. Baker to welcome the Rev. E. Parry in "the name of the congregation." Mr. Baker expressed the pleasure it gave him to be present, and trusted that the cordial relations which had always existed between minister and congregation would still continue, and wished the new comer a long and successful ministry. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford was the next speaker, who, in a vigorous address, emphasised the fact that Unitarians had always been on the side of true freedom and religious liberty, and in welcoming Mr. Parry bade him and the congregation stand firm to their traditions handed down by many honoured names. He alluded to the faithful work that had been done in the Western district in past days by such men as Edward Whitfield, of Ilminster; by William James, of Bristol; by William James Odgers, of Bath; by so wise and true a friend as Russell Lant Carpenter, of Bridport, who had passed to their honoured rest, and left to those who remained the duty of advocating our religious principles, to the sanctity of which the passing years made no difference. He urged every member of the congregation to support their minister by their personal interest in the public services of religion, and so deepen the religious life and the devotional element in their worship, which were absolutely essential to the true success of any church or of any ministry. The Rev. J. Worthington having joined in the welcome, the Rev. E. Parry responded, summarising the lines on which he proposed to conduct his ministry, and trusted that all would work most harmoniously together. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick having also added words of welcome, a vote of thanks to the chairman was proposed by Mr. J. Cogan Conway, who, as President of the Southern Unitarian Association, offered a very warm and neighbourly greeting to Mr. Parry, to whose worth he bore cordial testimony, after an acquaintance extending over nearly thirty years. The vote was seconded by the Rev. E. S. Anthony, and was carried by acclamation. The Chairman having responded, the Rev. E. Parry pronounced the Benediction, and the meeting terminated.

Kidderminster.—The Rev. E. D. P. Evans writes in his New Year's letter to the members of the New Meeting Congregation: "It is my hope and wish, during the Lenten season, to hold preparatory classes for a Confirmation Service, or Service of Church Welcome. Such services have been held only fitfully, largely because there has been no special time fixed for them, and also because we are without a good and appropriate form for such service. As Easter was one of the few times fixed by the early Christians for receiving new members into their midst, when the latter went through the solemn ceremony of Baptism, and thereby openly confessed to the world that they sided with and joined the unpopular and persecuted religion; so we shall try to make this same season the time for welcoming the younger members into our church. Easter may thus help us to remember the heroic spirits of the early church, and inspire us to rise out of the old into a new life."

Kingswood, nr. Birmingham.—The usual New Year dinner for the scholars of Kingswood Sunday-school was served to about 100 in the large room on the 4th inst. Games were played in the parsonage fields after dinner, and upon re-assembling in the school songs and recitations were given by scholars to a well-pleased audience. The presents from kind friends were numerous and attractive. On Tuesday, the 17th, the annual social meeting was held. The large room was well filled, and after tea the varied enjoyments of song, dance and games made the evening pass all too soon. The Rev. J. H. Matthews is giving a course of Sunday evening lectures on "Subjects from English History," tracing the religious history of our native land from the time of the Druids.

London: Bermondsey.—The fifth annual meeting of the Band of Hope was held on Tuesday last, when a good number of members and friends were present. The President, Mr. J. C. Pain, presided. The reports of the Secretary (Mr. A. W. Harris) and the Treasurer (Miss Snowsill) showed that successful meetings had been held weekly throughout the whole year, and that, thanks to the help willingly rendered by many friends, attendance and general interest had been well maintained. The various expenses of the society were all met, and a small balance remained in hand. The resolution for the adoption of the reports was spoken to by the Revs. A. J. Marchant, T. E. M. Edwards, Frederic Allen and Harold Rylett, and that for the election of officers by Messrs. A. H. Biggs and W. G. Dannel. All the speakers gave interesting addresses and warmly congratulated the society upon the year's work. Subsequently 15 medals and 23 prizes, awarded to junior members for regular attendance and good conduct during 1898 were distributed by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. A hearty vote of thanks to the visitors brought to a close a very enjoyable meeting.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—On Friday, Dec. 30, the members of the Band of Hope took tea together, after which came games followed by the distribution of prizes (books and medals) the gifts of Mr. A. H. Biggs, an ardent worker in the cause, and Mr. A. W. Harris. To the exertions of the latter is largely due the continued growth and success of the society. The president, the Rev. Frederic Allen, mentioned the gratifying fact that, though the meetings were held weekly, the average attendance had been fifty-one, as compared with an average of twenty-two in 1897. On the 31st the teachers and old scholars held their annual party. The children's New Year's service, on Sunday afternoon last, was conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard ("Aunt Amy"), who addressed nearly 250 scholars and teachers. Several texts, illuminated by a friend of "Aunt Amy's," had been framed and hung in front of the pulpit as a gift to the school. At the close a collection was taken for the Young Days' Cot at Winifred House. The Teachers' Monthly Tea and Conference, at which twenty-five were present, was held after the service in the church parlour. Miss Pritchard was present, and opened the after-meeting by speaking on "The Place of the Story in Sunday-school Teaching." Several speakers followed, and, on the proposition of the Rev. Frederic Allen, a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Miss Pritchard for her kindness that day. The Sunday-school New Year's parties were held as follows:—The younger scholars' on Wednesday, Jan. 4, when prizes were distributed by Mr. S. S. Taylor. On Thursday, the 5th, the elder scholars', when Mr. S. S. Taylor again gave the prizes which were presented, seventy-five books in all in the two evenings. The Provident Bank deposits for 1898 amounted to £674 odd, paid in by over 1,000 depositors—a large increase on the preceding year. On Sunday week the services were conducted by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, who gave discourses on "The Love of God" and "The Evolution of Hindu Theism."

London: Peckham.—On Sunday last the Rev. G. Carter, who has been incapacitated for about two months by an attack of iritis, following operation, resumed pulpit duty, being assisted in the reading portions of the services by Mr. J. Bredall in the morning and Mr. L. Cox in the evening. During the minister's absence one half of the services have been conducted by competent officers of the church, while valuable assistance has also been rendered both in the church and the literary society by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. It is confidently expected that Mr. Carter will soon be able to perform the whole of the duties devolving upon him as minister at Avondale-road Church with its affiliated institutions.

Loughborough.—The congregation here have lost a generous and faithful member in Mrs. Stubbs, who passed to her rest last Saturday, after a painful illness, most bravely and patiently borne.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A meeting of the members of the Unitarian Church was held in the Masonic Hall, on Tuesday evening, to welcome the Rev. James Ruddle to the ministry of the church. The congregation at present worships in the Masonic Hall, but a scheme is on hand for the erection of a church in Wilbraham-road, at a cost of about £2,000. The chair was taken by Mr. R. C. Law, who gave a hearty welcome to Mr. Ruddle in the name of the congregation. His remarks were supported by Mr. A. E. Piggott and Mr. J. A. Wadsworth, the latter gentleman speaking more especially on behalf of the Sunday-school. The Rev. Charles Roper, of Moss Side, extended to Mr. Ruddle the welcome of the ministers in the district. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, vice-president of the District Association, referring to the absence through illness of the Rev. Father Holt, of St. Augustine's Roman Catholic Church, who had undertaken to attend the meeting, said he was sorry they had not Father Holt's presence among them. He, for one, believed there was a ground of union sufficiently wide for even Father Holt and themselves to stand upon. That wider basis of common faith in a loving Father above, and in the blessed Gospel which Jesus proclaimed bound them together, however much they might differ in theological opinions. And so he hoped that congregation would find opportunities, under Mr. Ruddle's guidance, not merely to work for the extension of their own organisation, but to extend their influence in other directions. That good work could be done outside one's own congregation, he thought, Mr. Ruddle was a living proof. Mr. G. H. Leigh, president of the District Association, conveyed to Mr. Ruddle the welcome of the Association. He expressed the deep interest which the Association had all along taken in the work which was being done at Chorlton-cum-Hardy. He congratulated the congregation upon the fact that they would, before long, be in possession of a building which would be found to meet their requirements, and of which they might justly feel proud. He should feel that the Association had done admirable work if it succeeded, as he fully believed it would, in founding the four forward movement churches which it had been endeavouring to foster and see brought to a successful issue. Congratulations to minister and congregation upon Mr. Ruddle's appointment were offered by the Revs. Principal Gordon, Dendy Agate, and S. Thompson. Mr. Ruddle having replied, the Rev. J. Felstead offered prayer, after which a hymn was sung by the congregation. A conversazione concluded an exceedingly spirited and delightful meeting.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The first half of the winter's programme has been most successfully carried through. On Sunday evening the popular services will be resumed, when Mr. R. C. Dutt, an ex-Member of the Bombay Legislative Assembly, is to speak on "British Rule in India." On Monday next a series of free Monday lectures on "Holidays and Travels Abroad," with limelight illustrations, are to commence.

Moneyrea.—Last Saturday evening the annual meeting of the Temperance Guild was held. The report recorded a most successful year of work, showing a very encouraging increase on the results of the previous year's labours in the cause. Forty adults signed the pledge at the meeting. An appropriate address was delivered by the President, the Rev. R. Lyttle, who received a very hearty welcome on his return to work after a short absence through illness. The President said the Temperance Guild had shown a greater activity in the organisation of meetings of various kinds than any other society of any kind in the district. The office-bearers were re-elected, and some of the new members were elected on the Committee.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—The sixth annual congregational conversazione was held on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, in the Grand Assembly Rooms. A reception was held by the Rev. Frank and Mrs. Walters, when upwards of 240 members and friends were present. The proceedings were of a most enjoyable character, the vocalists being Miss Cecilia Armitage and Mr. Lindon Travers, F.R.G.S. The sermon delivered by Mr. Walters on Sunday evening, Dec. 25, entitled "What is your Life," has been printed in pamphlet form, and is having a large sale, the published price being one penny.

Plymouth.—A very successful and enjoyable entertainment in connection with the Plymouth Unitarian Sunday-school was held in the school-room on Friday evening, Jan. 13. The entertainment, followed by a Christmas-tree, consisted of piano solos, dialogues, recitations, scarf drill, and action songs. Nearly all the scholars took part.

Portsmouth.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached last Sunday morning in the High-street Chapel, from the words:—"Martha, thou art anxious and troubled about many things, but one thing is necessary; for Mary hath chosen the good part; which shall not be taken away from her." Luke x. 41, 42.

Sheffield.—Last Tuesday evening the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., gave a lantern lecture on the "Salt Mines at Wieliczka, in Austrian Poland" (the largest in the world), to the Upper Chapel Literary Society, Mr. W. Watts, F.R.G.S., in the chair. The lecture was interspersed with Polish national songs by the choir of the chapel, under the direction of Mr. Wragg.

Sheffield: Uppertorpe.—On Dec. 29 the scholars' party and winter festival was held. Over 150 children sat down to tea. Some fifty prizes were given for attendance. On Jan. 2 a teachers' and elder scholars' party was held. The old people's tea is an annual event at Uppertorpe. A substantial tea is given to 150 persons over sixty years of age, and each receives a quarter of a pound packet of tea to take home. After tea the children repeated their cantatas, plays, &c., given at their own party, and addresses were given by the Revs. J. E. Manning, T. W. Holmes (Congregationalist), and John Ellis.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday, Jan. 8, Mr. Promotho Iol Sen preached in High-street Church, his subject in the morning being "Can Man see God?" In the evening Mr. Sen delivered his lecture on the Brahmo Somaj. At the close of the lecture the Rev. J. C. Street announced a lecture on "Vaccination" by General Phelps, of Birmingham, as the opening meeting of the second half session of the High-street Literary Society. They had wished to have the lecture in the Working Men's Hall, but this had been refused by the Trustees on the ground that the applicants were Unitarians, the lecture would therefore be held in their church. Commenting on this a local paper says:—"It seems that the Trustees consider the High-street Literary Society to be Unitarian, though it is absolutely unsectarian, and they refuse, according to their Trust, to allow anyone to take the hall who is not a believer in the doctrine of the Trinity. Why the Trustees should have mixed up a literary society and a question of public health with the doctrine of the Trinity we do not know."

Torquay.—The Rev. Priestley Prime will not conclude his ministry here before Easter, when he removes to Heaton Moor.

Whitchurch.—The annual congregational party was held on Jan. 12. After tea the Rev. W. F. Turland took the chair, when the treasurer's statement was read, showing a balance in hand. Votes of thanks were passed to members of the congregation who had rendered special services, and games followed the business, concluding a very pleasant evening. Jan. 15 was the twenty-second anniversary of the church. Special sermons were preached by the minister, setting forth the aims of the church, and urging the members to renewed faithfulness in the practical religion of daily life.

ETHICAL RELIGION.

for Theists.*

A Compilation of Selected Passages Freely
Arranged without Note or Comment.

Published by WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta-street. Price One Shilling.

Sold by PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex-street, Strand.

If it is "the Personal Religion of Jesus" that we would learn; what He actually taught, and what His real life meant—not what other men believed or declared of Him after His departure—this "reasonable quest of sacred truth" must be directed to that portion of the books in our possession, which can be relied upon as an historical record. Original written documents, fairly well attested, were available in the Apostolic age. These were, first, the reports of public discourses, heard and noted down by Matthew, who would, from the nature of his secular business, be able to write in his native language, though Peter and John, the fishermen, were at that time illiterate men; and secondly, the collection of biographical data gathered by Mark, when he served the Apostolic missions as secretary, from his conversations with men who had accompanied Jesus in Galilee. To these materials we may safely add the parables, likely to have been preserved by frequent oral repetition at Christian meetings; and a few obviously characteristic personal anecdotes.

A serious attempt, a merely tentative essay, is here ventured, to show that such probably genuine elements of the books called "the First Three" or "Synoptic Gospels"—which books, in their present form, cannot be proved to have existed before the middle, at any rate, of the Second Century—may be separated from whatever additions or interpolations should appear due to anonymous, irresponsible, literary compilers, in those composite, amplified narratives, our "Scriptures," which were subsequently adopted by the ecclesiastical canon. It will not be deemed a reprehensible intrusion. It is now submitted, but with some diffidence, only as an experiment, in the hope that more competent scholars will soon undertake this needful task. The following rules for determining the unauthenticity of passages abounding in the "Three First Gospels" are laid down by the Rev. Dr. Martineau in "The Seat of Authority in Religion" (Edition of 1890, pages 577, 593, 596, 652):—

"THE VEIL TAKEN AWAY."

"1. Wherever, during or before the ministry of Jesus, any person in the narrative is made to speak in language, or refer to events, which had their origin at a later date, the report is incredible as an anachronism.

"2. Miraculous events cannot be regarded as adequately attested, in presence of natural causes accounting for belief in their occurrence.

"3. Acts and words ascribed to Jesus, which plainly transcend the moral level of the narrators, authenticate themselves as his; while such as are out of character with his spirit, but congruous with theirs, must be referred to inaccurate tradition.

"The first of these rules compels us to treat as unauthentic, in its present form, every reputed or implied claim of Jesus to be the promised Messiah.

"While it is impossible to reach any original attestation, which we can appreciate as adequate, to substantiate the tales that would be incredible to-day, nothing is more certain than that, in the state of mind out of which the Church was born, miracles would have been freely believed, whether they had really happened or not."—(Page 593.)

"The application of our third rule, excluding what is incongruous with the personal characteristics of Jesus, is a much more difficult and delicate task for the critic than he encounters with the other two; nor will his hauling of it, however cautious, bring conviction to those who require more definite grounds of belief than those afforded by harmony and disharmony in the shades of character. And yet, to those who cannot help being affected by such phenomena, there is nothing more persuasive."—(Page 596.)

"THE RELIGION PERSONALLY REALISED."

"If Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God."—(Page 652.)

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE death of the Rev. Thomas Hincks, which we announce to-day, removes one of the most venerable names from the roll of our living ministers. Failure of voice, after a ministry of fourteen years at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, terminated in 1869 Mr. Hinck's period of active service, which had commenced in 1839. The last time it was our privilege to see him in our midst on a public occasion was at the opening of Manchester College, Oxford. To the present generation Mr. Hincks is, perhaps, best known as the author of his beautiful vesper hymns. We hope next week to publish a fuller memorial notice.

THE annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, the President, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., in the chair. The Manchester Guardian of the following day contained a good report, but we shall keep back our own account of the meeting until next week, in order to secure a fuller report both of the President's address and of the speeches at the evening meeting.

THE Christian Register of January 5 contains the first of a series of "Reminiscences of the Unitarian Pulpit," by Dr. Edward Everett Hale. The subject of this first paper is Dr. Channing, and it is illustrated by reproductions of Gambardella's well-known and beautiful portrait of Channing, Thomas Gould's statue, and pictures of Channing's birthplace at Newport, his Boston home, the Federal-street Meeting House where he was ordained, &c. The series is to be continued monthly, the February number dealing with Dr. Walker, and the March number with Dr. Furness.

THE text of Count Muravieff's second circular, addressed to the representatives of the Powers on the subject of the Tsar's Proposals for a Conference on Armaments, has now been published. It is not a final programme, but contains a series of suggestions for consideration in the drafting of the Conference programme. There does not seem much hope of dealing effectually with the question of more destructive materials and more deadly arms, the discovery or invention of which can hardly be checked. But if the Conference can lead to the acceptance of some method by which Courts of Arbitration shall interpose delay wherever danger of war arises, an immense advantage will be gained for the cause of peace.

THE religious and temperance world of Manchester has been deeply stirred by the temperance mission conducted by the Rev. L. M. Isitt. Night after night the Great St. James's Hall has been crowded to its utmost capacity. At the closing meeting an audience of 6,000 persons assembled, and both the hall and the platform showed how great moral questions can still lift us above sectarian divisions. For not only was the audience drawn from all classes and creeds in the city, but the platform was equally representative. The president of the mission was Dr. McLaren (Baptist), and, at the closing meeting, the chairman was Canon Hicks (Anglican), prayer was offered by the Rev. C. Peach (Unitarian), and the address was given by the missionary, the Rev. L. M. Isitt (Wesleyan).

AT the first meeting of the executive of the Nonconformist Political Council, held at the National Liberal Club, Mr. R. W. Perks, M.P., President, in the chair, it was resolved to take action with a view to facilitate the introduction during the coming Session of such measures as "The Burials Bill," "Enfranchisement of Leaseholds (Chapels) Bill," "Places of Worship Sites Bill." The following resolution was passed on the school struggle now going on at St. James's End, Northampton :—

"The executive of the Nonconformist Political Council congratulates the Nonconformists of Northampton on their persistent refusal to allow their children to be taught the objectionable doctrines of the Church of England Catechism in the St. James's End School, and recognises with admiration the arrangement by which nearly three hundred Nonconformist children are assembled every morning in another building for simple moral and religious instruction. The executive protests against the unjust law which prevents the opening of Board-schools in thousands of places where they are wanted as at St. James's, and it further declares that no corporal punishment ought to be inflicted upon children whose only offence seems to have been the wearing of a medal in connection with the use of the conscience clause."

NOT only has Dr. Munro Gibson essayed to prove by diagrams and elaborate explanations in the Free Church Chronicle that the present century ends with this year 1899, but at least three bishops in their New Year's pastorals seem to have adopted the same view, as also the Daily Chronicle, if we remember rightly, spoke in a leader on January 2, of the opening of the last year of the century. This is a subject, we are aware, which divides close friends, and may not be mentioned in some households, and yet at the risk of a charge of shameless dogmatism we must say that the matter is as clear as daylight. A century begins with the year one, and it must have a hundred years in it. Therefore the last year of the century is not the 99 but the 100—that is, in our own case, 1900, and not 1899. On this principle, at any rate, we give notice that we shall act. If the first century did not begin with the year one, what did it begin with?

THE REV. R. H. CHARLES, D.D., is delivering the second part of his Jowett lectures on Eschatology at the Passmore Edward's Settlement, Tavistock-place, on Tuesday afternoons. The lectures deal with the Eschatology of the New Testament, the special subject for next Tuesday being the Apocalypse and the Johannine and Petrine Eschatology. The concluding lecture on February 7 is to deal with the Pauline Eschatology. The lectures are at 5.15 p.m., and admission is free, without ticket. Dr. Charles is also to deliver three public lectures in Manchester College, Oxford, on the foundation of the Hibbert Trust, his subject being "The Doctrine of the Last Things in Israel and Judah." The lectures are at 5 p.m. on Thursday, January 26; Monday, January 30; and Monday, February 2.

MR. BALFOUR has addressed a long letter to one of his constituents in East Manchester, on the subject of the proposed new University for Ireland. The scheme to which he refers includes, in fact, the establishment of two new teaching Universities, one in Dublin and the other in Belfast. The Dublin University is to meet the needs of Roman Catholics, with a governing body and teaching staff which would command their confidence, while the northern University would absorb and carry on the traditions of Queen's College, Belfast. "Both Universities," Mr. Balfour says, "would be rigidly subject to the Test Acts; all scholarships and fellowships paid out of public funds would be open to competition, irrespective of creed; no public endowment would be given to chairs in philosophy, theology, or modern history; professors would have a right of appeal against unjust dismissal; and the number of clergy in the governing body would be strictly limited." For our own part, while we must regret that such a division in the higher education of the people cannot be avoided, the proposal seems to us a measure of justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland too long delayed.

DEALING with Mr. Balfour's letter, the Daily Chronicle quoted the following striking passage written twenty years ago by Matthew Arnold on Irish University education:—

In Ireland the Catholics are more than three-fourths of the nation; and they desire a University where the religious instruction is Catholic, and where debatable matters, such as philosophy and history, are taught by Catholics. They are offered something quite different, which they will not have. Then they are told that a University of the kind they want they must found and maintain for themselves, if they are to have it at all. But in France the State provides, even for the Protestant minority, a University instruction of the type that the Irish Catholics want. In Prussia the State provides it for the Catholic minority. In England and Scotland old endowments have been made to follow the will of the majority, and supplemented by State grants they provide the majority with a University instruction of the type that the Irish Catholics want. In Ireland, so far as old University endowments from following the will of the majority, that they follow, as every one knows, that of the minority. At Trinity College, Dublin, the Irish Protestants have a University instruction of the type that the Irish Catholics want. Trinity College is endowed with confiscated Catholic lands and occupies the site of a suppressed monastery. The Catholic majority in Ireland is neither allowed the use of the old endowments to give it a University instruction such as it desires, and such as in England and Scotland we make the old endowments give us, nor is it allowed the aid of State grants. There is really nothing like it, I repeat, in Europe. To treat the Irish Catholics in this way is really to have one weight and measure for ourselves and another for the Irish. It is, however we may dress the thing up to our own minds, to treat Ireland still as a conquered country. It is a survival from the state of things when no Irish Catholic might own a horse worth more than £5. The Irish cannot but feel it to be so.

A WRITER in the Church Gazette looking back upon 1898 and forward into the future, finds little cause for satisfaction in the present ecclesiastical situation, or in the attitude of the mass of the people towards the Church; but on the practical side of life he thankfully notes the progress of genuine Christianity:—

"Comparisons are said to be odious, and possibly they are so, but it is only by comparing with a standard that progress can be gauged. We have the life of Christ for a standard, and in all the signs to which he pointed as evidence of his presence in mankind, we may fearlessly compare ourselves not with the Dark Ages, but with the early decades of this century. If anyone doubts this, let him read what Romilly had to do to reform the Criminal Law, and let him consider if Charles Dickens could write now of the Poor Law as he did in the thirties.

"And surely the Tsar's Rescript and the reception it has had in our midst are in some sort a sign of the presence of the Prince of Peace. What are we to say, then?"

"On the one hand we see the men and women of our day casting aside creeds and dogmas, and on the other showing in their lives the essential marks of Christianity. The lesson for Christmas morning tells us that his mother wrapped the Christ in swaddling clothes. We must suppose that these stiff, restraining garments were necessary for his infant body, but we know that as he grew, and that he might grow, and develop, and come to his full strength, they would be one by one discarded.

"In some way it seems to me the Christ in humanity is stretching out his limbs, the swaddling clothes of creeds and dogmas are falling from him, and he is rapidly reaching his full stature and strength.

"'Ecce homo' is written in glorious proportions across the horizon of the future."

THE life of John Knox in Messrs. Methuen's "Leaders of Religion" Series contains an interesting chapter on "The Book of Discipline and the Book of Common Order." The following extract shows in what mind the early Scottish reformers made provision for the ministers of their Church:—

There were three objects for which the funds of the Church were to provide:—(1) Stipends for ministers of all grades, (2) support of the poor, (3) maintenance of schools and colleges. Two reasons are urged for liberal provision to be made for ministers. It was necessary to attract the best and most learned men into the Church. "It is not to be supposed that every man will dedicate himself and children so to God, and to serve his Church, that they look for no worldly commodity . . . and sorry would we be that poverty should discourage men from study and from following the way of virtue, by which they might edify the Church and flock of Christ Jesus." Further, if the ministers were to have sufficient dignity and influence, it was necessary that they should have "neither occasion of solicitude, neither yet of insolency and wantonness." The needs of a minister were held to include books, and the claims of a simple hospitality; their stipends were calculated to put them on a level with lairds of moderate rental; and, because good men are chiefly distracted from the public service by a natural and laudable anxiety for wife and children, the Church was to provide for these after the minister's death, taking care that the children received good learning or were started in an honest trade.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL, of Glasgow, of whom we published a memorial notice last week, was the father of the late Rev. John Russell, of Kendal, and subsequently of Macclesfield.

If once the higher powers in us are awake they chafe against our own sluggishness; they will not let us rest, they glare at us in our very dreams.—C. G. Ames.

"THOUGHT, grown too quick and active for love, becomes a painful restlessness. It is incapable of any flight to steady aim that shall enable it to migrate from clime to clime of truth; but is like the swallow that has lost its nest, wheeling in idle circles through the air, sweeping the grass or tipping the water with its wing, still hovering round its place of loss, with a cry that proclaims it desolate."—Martineau "Hours of Thought."

REPORT FROM BRUSSELS.

THE annual meeting of the Protestant Liberal Church took place on Sunday, January 15. There was a good attendance. The report stated that two members had died, and that two had left the country during the year. Three new members had been enrolled. There were nine children in the Sunday morning class, conducted by the pastor, and fifteen young people in the Thursday afternoon class. At Ghent there were only four children at present in the class, but the public meetings continue to be well attended. It was not possible to close the yearly accounts, as some donations to the amount of £16 had not yet been paid in. There was a large fall in the subscriptions—from £141 4s. in 1897 to £113 8s. in 1898—owing to the death of three subscribers, one of whom gave us £28 per annum. On the other hand, there was an important decrease in the rent of the hall, as the present hall is only rented for Sunday mornings. The deficiency stands at present at £56 4s. 11½d., but when all sums promised are paid we hope it will be reduced to about £40. The donations from abroad, including £10 from the B. and F.U.A., amounted to £72 18s. 7d., and very cordial thanks were voted to our kind and persevering friends in England and Holland. Votes of thanks were also passed to the pastor and to Mr. Anspach-Puissant, our counsel, who accepts no remuneration for his work and trouble in our long and wearisome legal struggle. The tone of the meeting was very cordial and encouraging. The gain of the first lawsuit before the highest Court, the Court of Cassation; the success of the lectures against anti-Semitism, which brought many outsiders and attracted the notice of leading newspapers, and one of which was to be repeated at the Maison du Peuple, the Socialist headquarters at Brussels, and at Mons and Charleroi; the decided improvement in the minister's health—these causes and others seemed to have infused a new hopefulness and energy in the hearts of our members, and they responded very heartily to the appeal made by Mr. Anspach-Puissant, in returning thanks, that they should all rally round the minister and second him to the best of their power.

WE have heard with much regret of the very serious and painful illness of the Rev. Robert Spears. The report as we go to press is somewhat better, and it is hoped that if Mr. Spears can obtain complete rest for some months, he may be restored to health. We beg to assure our friend and neighbour of the sincerest sympathy with him in the severe trial through which he is passing.

LITERATURE.

HENRY DRUMMOND.*

FROM this admirable biography of a very interesting man the reader takes, among other impressions, one which I record with diffidence, as being beneath the dignity of my subject—I mean the luck of Henry Drummond. I speak of it at the beginning not only because it lies, as such notions always lie, upon the surface of the mind, obscuring deeper thoughts until it is spoken, but also because the explanation of this fancy explains much that is better worth examination. "He had against him," says Matthew Arnold of Keats, "the blind power which we call Fortune." But Fortune was Drummond's faithful handmaid. After an Arts course, which in another man's case we should call a failure, Professor Geikie offers him a tutorship. His Divinity course is interrupted by a great missionary movement, which provides him with an opportunity of delivering public addresses, under the most favourable conditions, to hundreds of thousands of young men, and lifts him easily up, at the age of twenty-three, to a fame which no other conceivable combination of circumstances could have bestowed upon him. After leaving the University, while he hovers on the brink of the ministry—terrified by the necessity of providing two sermons a week, but unable to reconcile himself to secular employment—an opportune vacancy provides him with the very post he desires, that of natural science lecturer in a theological college. His lectures never rise above the rudiments of his subject; nevertheless, he is raised, by some eddy in ecclesiastical politics, to the dignity of professor. He publishes a book, which nobody now considers a very good book, and rises at one bound to the height of literary renown. "His book achieved a most amazing popularity." . . . "The sales have reached one hundred and twenty-three thousand in Great Britain alone." In sum, for the catalogue of his good haps would grow tedious, lucrative appointments involving a traveller's holiday, positions of ease, dignity and emolument, political advancement and the favours of the great, all came to Henry Drummond, cap in hand, begging him to accept them; and all the people best worth knowing in these islands seem to have been candidates for his acquaintance. His whole life, to within two years of its end, was one of glowing health and buoyant happiness.

Another impression which this life produces on the reader is one of paradox. Drummond is an incarnation of the rhetorical figure called oxymoron. On the one hand he is an evangelist in the Moody and Sankey troupe, and so devoted to his leaders that he prefers eight hundred miles of railway, with their society at the end, to a quiet evening with Longfellow and Holmes. On the other hand his personal charm and distinction are such that men like Mr. Arthur Balfour and the present Viceroy of India, together with academic princes and officers in the Guards, send him a requisition to address them on Sunday afternoons at Grosvenor House during the London season. It is perhaps equally surprising that a man whose main work in life is that of an evangelica missionary should smoke, play billiards, shoot, fish and run all over Scotland after football matches; that a Scotch lecturer in elementary biology should become the unofficial father confessor to hundreds of men and women, "of every rank of life and of almost every nation under the sun"; that the author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" should be the author of "The Ascent of Man"; and that a man whose life was almost free from any kind of affliction, one to whom those prizes came unsought which most men die before they win, should present to us, in the long-drawn agony of his end, an example of unblemished courage and endurance, more heroic, because more simple, than that of Heine.

One key will serve for both riddles. If you subtract from Drummond's life one element, the nature and degree of his influence upon other souls, the rest is common-place; there remains only the student who fails to gain his degree, the mediocre scientist, the feeble philosopher, the tiresome preacher (p. 113), the everyday holiday-maker. With regard to the degree of his influence there can be no doubt: what was its nature? Outwardly it was of the kind which we call magnetic, and can hardly be dissociated from his youthful practice of mesmerism. He contributed to his college magazine a paper on "Mesmerism and Animal Magnetism," which is described as "an enthusiastic defence of the sincerity and usefulness of a movement then under much ridicule." We are told that he developed an aptitude for "electro-biology," and some curious anecdotes are given of his successful experiments on fellow-students. Consider, in this light, Drummond's extraordinary power of making friends; the strange hold which he kept upon numberless large meetings of young men, though his speaking was neither passionate, rhetorical nor of any cognisable excellence; and the story of one who was converted by Henry Drummond's hand on his shoulder, and Henry Drummond's look in his eyes. But when we have given his influence on men the epithet magnetic, with the vague associations implied therein, we have still to ask what are the secret springs of such a power. Without lingering to discuss the various possible replies, I will give that which seems to me best. The origin of Drummond's magnetic influence seems to me to have lain in his character, in the happy balance of his temperament and the easy sovereignty of his will. Only so, I believe, can we explain the whole range of his power over his contemporaries. It was not alone his physical presence—"the Prince's" air, the earnest cheerfulness, the piercing eye—which impressed them. His letters, his books, wielded an equal fascination. Their popularity bears no relation to their intellectual merit, and what is called their literary merit resolves itself, upon analysis, into something very near akin to character. The charm of his language lies in the reader's sense of direct contact with the writer's personality. A greater proportion, perhaps, of his readers wrote letters to him, anxious and grateful, hailing the prophet and asking a word of the Lord from him, than ever beset an author. "Logic," says a biographer who stops only just this side idolatry, "was often his weak point." Again, "for philosophy he had never any gift, and he often chafed those who had." Yet he made his two great literary essays in that field of philosophy where logic must tread most warily. How can we explain the huge success of these logical failures, save by referring it to the "magnetic" stress of Drummond's character? And, indeed, if we would retain any respect for the British public which devoured and acclaimed his books, we are forced to use this key; for while his logic was weak, his philosophy slight, his science elementary, his character was grand and beautiful. What did it matter that he had but a poor array of facts—poor, that is, in relation to his vast topic—and that even on those he could not reason well, when a fragrance of happy, natural, uncompromising righteousness pervaded all he wrote? If we read it so, his life becomes a sermon, salutary and opportune, upon the power of mere goodness to do its own work in the world. "If you get simple goodness and nought else, you get about the best thing God invents." Jesus had no learning, no knowledge of the world. Paul would probably have been floored by a Responsions paper in Deductive Logic. Drummond, too—be it kindly said—was not of any great intellectual stature. These three men did their work by force of character, and in each case the character was beautiful and sound. Every character which is beautiful and sound is also strong, and no other source of influence over men can vie with that which at once compels their conscience and wins their love.

Of Drummond's travels and their results it is not necessary to speak. They are fully recounted by his biographer, and add to the interest of the book. Nor need I write much about his two chief works. "Natural Law" is dead. "The Ascent of Man," so far as it appeals to the intellect, is inferior to those works of Fiske on which it is evidently based. Drummond's central idea, the scientific value of altruism in evolution, was not new—it is to be found even in Darwin. What constitutes the value of the book—and it is far more precious than "Natural Law"—is the delight with which the writer's moral self disports itself in this idea. We feel that a theory which is so genial to a soul so clean must needs lie near the centre of human truth. Perhaps the intellectual form will be discredited, will pass away, but only, we feel sure, to enable the necessities of conscience to satisfy themselves even more fully in a new range of thought.

This is a book which every earnest man will read with deep interest, and one from which none can fail to receive spiritual help. E. W. LUMMIS.

SAMUEL E. SEWALL departed this life in December, 1888, in his ninetieth year. He was a distinguished lawyer in Boston, sometimes called by his friends "Judge Sewall." He never sat on the Bench, though one of his grandfathers was, in 1700, the first Chief Justice of the State of Massachusetts. Mr. Sewall's position in his profession and his legal lore were of the highest, but he was still more remarkable for the noble stand he took, from the first, with Garrison and the Abolitionists of the "Martyr Age," to whom he was a mainstay, ever ready in any emergency to lend a hand with legal advice, and not less with his purse. He was a Unitarian and a loyal follower of Dr. Channing who was twenty years his senior. As was natural the Zeitgeist took a stronger hold of the younger man, and he associated himself more closely with the aggressive party than his pastor did. He entered heart and soul into that enthusiasm of humanity which carried all before it thirty years later.

But honour to whom honour is due. At the memorial service held in 1880 on the centenary of Dr. Channing's birth Mr. Sewall bore witness:—

Dr. Channing's eloquence and weight of character rendered him a great power in the anti-slavery movement. At its very outset he spoke with perfect freedom against slavery from his pulpit to a congregation, many and perhaps most of whom did not sympathise with him. During the rest of his life his thoughts dwelt much on the subject, and he spoke, wrote, and published abundantly upon it. I well remember a sermon which he preached in his own church, in which he said emphatically: "Man cannot hold property in man." A very respectable lawyer, on our leaving the church, at this time said to me: "I do not know what Dr. Channing meant. Slavery is legal in all the Southern States."

Such was the conventional conscience of that day. To awaken it there was need for Garrison and his friends to cry aloud and spare not.

In her chapter on "Anti-Slavery Beginnings" his biographer relates:—

To the first lecture given by Garrison in Boston Mr. Sewall went with A. Bronson Alcott and Samuel J. May. "Truer men," as May afterwards said, "could not have been found." The three went to Mr. Garrison after the lecture was over, introduced themselves, and asked him to go with them to Mr. Alcott's house for further conversation. He went, says Mr. May, and he sat with him till twelve that night listening to his discourse, in which he showed plainly that immediate unconditional emancipation was the right of every slave, and could not be withheld by his master an hour without sin. Mr. Sewall's conversion, like that of the others, was complete. He entered warmly into Garrison's plans, secured for him a better hall in which to repeat the first lecture, afterwards helped him to establish the Liberator, and through all the differences of opinion, as to methods, that inevitably rose between them, remained his fast friend.

Space will not admit of even a summary of some fifty pages describing the struggle with the powers that be which the Abolitionists had to maintain in defence of their principles. Law cases were frequent when Southerners brought their slaves to Boston and human rights were claimed for them, in which Mr. Sewall acted as counsel, and these cases became still more acute when the Fugitive Slave Law was passed in 1850. This law Mr. Sewall held to be unconstitutional. "The opponents of the Act should take," he said, "the impregnable ground that slavery cannot be legalised by statute or constitution." But the magistrates of Boston, supported by the property and standing of the city, decided differently, and the Puritan capital became the legal hunting ground of slaveholders.

Though, with Browning, Mr. Sewall was "one who never turned his back but marched breast forward," he held his own in matters of principle and policy. To an inquiring friend he wrote:—"I did not follow Garrison in believing in non-resistance, in refusing to vote, and in recommending a dissolution of the Union; I always voted, and joined the Liberty party as soon as it was formed. From this I became, in due course, a member of the Republican party."

In his fifty-second year Samuel E. Sewall was elected a member of the Massachusetts Senate, and was chosen chairman to the Judiciary Committee. He was thus enabled to exercise a wholesome influence on many important subjects. The Bills he introduced in favour of personal liberty, of justice and equity, in all the relations of life, are too numerous to recount. But we cannot conclude this brief notice of his judicial life without a quotation from the memoir. His biographer, in her chapter entitled "The Defender of Women," says:—

Freely as Mr. Sewall had given himself to the cause of the slaves, his special work, and that for which he will perhaps longest be known, was his championship of women. By nature chivalrous, tender, just, he could not see suffering without trying to relieve it, or witness the crowding of the strong against the weak without interposing a warding arm. Women were to him, even more truly than to the knights of old, objects of unselfish devotion. . . . The character and ability of the women engaged with him in the Anti-slavery cause, women like Lucretia Mott, Maria Child, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and the women of his own household, were a powerful impetus to his desire to clear from the path of all women every obstacle of law or custom that hindered their progress. Through all the disabilities under which women struggled, he discerned the latent capacities which would be developed in them under wider opportunities. . . . He not only entered upon a crusade to obtain for women equality with men before the law, but in countless instances he took upon him to succour individual distress.

Session after session he brought in Bills relating to women's property rights, education, legal status, suffrage, and testamentary and parental rights. In the memorial lines of his poet-wife, who survived him:—

Each year with zeal and courage unabated,
Thy struggle was renewed against the wrong;
No failure could discourage or embitter
A heart and will so hopeful and so strong.
With such unwavering trust and patience gifted,
Oh, what to thee were laurels and renown?
By foresight of the future good uplifted,
Thy faith and zeal were both reward and crown.

The writer of those lines was Mr. Sewall's second wife, and the younger sister of his first wife, to whom he was married in 1836. They were Friends who, under the influence of Dr. Channing's teaching, became Unitarians. But we must not linger over the story of their home life, and of its gracious hospitalities, and for this must refer our readers to the book itself. The little volume of 170 pages contains an excellent portrait, and is prefaced by Whittier's lines, with which this brief notice may conclude:—

SAMUEL E. SEWALL.

Like that ancestral judge who bore his name,
Faithful to freedom and to truth, he gave,
When all the air was hot with wrath and blame,
His youth and manhood to the fettered slave.

And never woman in her suffering saw
A helper tender, wise, and brave as he;
Lifting her burden of unrighteous law,
He shamed the boasts of ancient chivalry.
Noiseless as light that melts the darkness is,
He wrought as duty led and honour bid;
No trumpet heralds victories like his—
The unselfish worker in his work is hid.

THE SOUL HERE AND HERE-AFTER.*

THIS is a book of orthodox liberality, by which we do not mean that it inclines by so much as an hair-breadth to anything heterodox, but that in the gladness of its own perfect and infallible revelation it rejoices to observe how nearly many outside that charmed circle have approximated toward the truths which are known to be true by those within. It rejoices with others less fortunate than itself, it rejoices in the Heathen philosophies and the Pagan hopes, and the universal foreshadowings of the soul's intrinsic life and eternal being. It reviews with gladness the anticipations of Christianity to be found in the Pagan world. It brings together the views of the Church and of the Fathers, and of Aristotle, and Plato, and Socrates, of Dr. Jowett and Lord Macaulay, of the Holy Scripture and modern science, and in the truth of the Incarnation finds the key and the truth of all the rest. Thus friendship with God, foreshadowed by the friendships of the ancient world—Greek, Roman, and Hebrew examples of friendship—lost to Adam through Eve, is restored to us through the Blessed Mary by Jesus. It is through Mary that the Light of the World has been given to us, and friendship with God restored to us, and we salute with simple gratitude the Holy Virgin Mother of God. One hardly attempts ordinary criticism point by point in dealing with such a book, but rather expresses simple non-acceptance of its fundamental assumptions. Thus, in reference to the life of the world to come—"There is but one source of reliable knowledge—revelation. Revelation comes to us (1) through the voice of God speaking in the Holy Scripture—the verbum Dei scriptum; and (2) through the voice of God speaking through the Church—the verbum Dei traditum. But besides revelation we have the voice of multitudes who have lived, or perhaps are now living, outside the covenanted sphere of revelation." We entirely disagree with the assumption here made—namely, that revelation is limited by covenant to a particular book or Church, and that outside that book or Church is outside revelation.

First we would point out the hopelessly divergent views of Holy Scripture as regards the future life: that one text in favour of it can be refuted by another denying it. Next we would remind the author that Holy Scripture, before the Babylonish captivity, had little hope of a future life: and this verbum Dei scriptum is somewhat of a trans-scriptum from the better-informed faith of the Zoroastrian and heathen philosophers. The author himself admits that the Egyptians taught a future life of rewards and punishments whilst Moses did not. This seems a clear case against his whole position. But his answer is stalwart: "It would seem the time had not come for the chosen people of God to be instructed as to the future life" (p. 186). In other words the theory of covenanted revelation is now defended on the ground that God wisely kept His own people in the dark. The wisdom of this shows that it must have been God Himself, and not Moses, who ordered it thus. When Church and Scripture have more light than others, God's peculiar revelation is manifest, and when Church and Scripture are more densely ignorant than others, the bliss of ignorance is dwelt upon, and as no man could have kept an obvious truth dark so long, we are again invited to behold in this peculiar darkness a manifest revelation. The book is a circular ticket to where it starts from—blind dogmatism.

WILFRED HARRIS.

TWO "YEAR BOOKS" FOR 1899.

THE American Unitarian Association and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association issue their Year Books on much the same plan, though the English book is still the more complete of the two. The American editor, following the example set for some years by his English brother, has in the issue for 1899 given some useful statistics respecting ministers and churches, and it is interesting to compare these figures with those given in the "Essex Hall Year Book."

There are in the "American Year Book for 1899" the names of 551 ministers. Of these 357 are in charge of churches, 21 are engaged in active work as administrators or teachers, 116 are on the retired list, and 57 are open to accept invitations to pastorates. It is noted that seven ministers had died, one had become the pastor of a Trinitarian church, and five had been "dropped from the list by instruction of the Fellowship Committee." Of the new names, five had been educated at Cambridge, five at Meadville, and eleven had been ministers of other denominations—three Congregationalists, two Methodists, two Presbyterians, three Universalists, and one Lutheran. Mr. J. Worsley Austin, formerly of Manchester College, Oxford, is included among the new names; also a minister of an unfamiliar type "who brought his church with him into the Unitarian fellowship."

The "Essex Hall Year Book for 1899" contains the names of 370 ministers, including twelve who are described as "lay-workers." Of these 294 are in charge of churches, 13 are employed as professors, secretaries, or tutors, 45 are on the retired list, and 18 are open to accept appointments. Among the names omitted five had died, one had withdrawn from the profession, and another desired his name withdrawn from the list. Of the new names, five had been educated at Manchester College, one at the Home Missionary College, one had come over from the Congregationalists, and one from the Established Church.

Turning next to the churches, the "American Year Book" contains a list of 454. Of these 19 had held no services during the past year, 9 had services during the summer months only, 46 had occasional services only; 342 had settled ministers. During 1898, seven new churches had been organised, and an equal number had dropped out: "it may be safely affirmed that most of the new churches are real additions to the vigor and vitality of the Unitarian movement, while the names omitted represented no strength, and might have disappeared some years ago as appropriately as now."

The "Essex Hall Year Book" contains a list of 364 places of worship—235 in England, 32 in Wales, 8 in Scotland, and 39 in Ireland. Several of these are mission stations and pioneer movements;

there were 294 settled ministers. The names of five new places, where efforts are being made—they can hardly be called churches yet—have been added to the list. There were twenty vacant pulpits at the end of 1898; but Heaton Moor and Urmston, and Pendleton have since appointed ministers, while Torquay and Aberdare have become vacant.

In view of the scheme which the London District Unitarian Society is seeking to promote, it is interesting to observe that the Church Building Loan Fund in America was started by the Unitarian Association, with the aid of the National Conference. No money is bestowed as a gift, all loans being made on adequate security. Not more than half the whole value of a building and the land is ever advanced, and no loan is made unless it suffices to clear the property of all other indebtedness. Sums not exceeding £2,000 may be loaned from the fund, with or without interest as may be determined in each case, but in every case provision shall be made for the annual repayment of a certain fixed portion of the sum loaned.

The Fellowship Committee in America, corresponding to our English Advisory Committees, has jurisdiction over the list of ministers published in the Year Book. It has power to cause the removal of the names of persons proved unworthy, and of adding the names of persons judged worthy of enrolment. "All churches," says one of the rules, "are hereby warned of the serious danger they incur by settling a minister whose name does not appear in the authorised list, or who has not received the approval of the Fellowship Committee."

In their respective countries each of these Year Books may claim to have established itself as an invaluable handbook to all who take an interest in the work of our churches and institutions.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Baptist Handbook for 1899.—No good Baptist can afford to be without this admirable Handbook, and those who are not Baptists will find much that is instructive and suggestive in this volume of more than 550 pages. The officers, ministers, and societies of the Baptist denomination are recorded with great fulness, and the addresses and papers read before the Assembly are also included. There are lists of Baptist Churches in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia. A well-known feature in the Handbook is the architectural descriptions and illustrations of new or reconstructed chapels. There are some excellent rules relating to the duties of the Ministerial Recognition Committee. It is pointed out that in reference to candidates who decline, or from other circumstances fail to receive, a collegiate training, the Committee are called upon to perform an exceedingly difficult and delicate task: they have to impress upon the churches the great importance of devout caution and judgment in the choice of a pastor; and to remind them that the credentials of character and fitness required of a candidate for collegiate training are no less essential in other candidates for the pastorate. (James Clarke and Co. 2s.)

Christopher Crayon's Recollections.—The personal recollections of the late James Ewing Ritchie make up a pleasant batch of disconnected notes on men and things. There is nothing of very keen interest in the volume, but the whole forms a chatty bit of company for anyone having an hour to pass and not anxious for excitements. The writer just sits down at the study fire with you, lights his pipe, and talks of anything that happens to come into his head. Hard-fought political elections, men more or less well known whom the ubiquitous Christopher had met, his own early experiences as a theological student or as a newspaper contributor, his attempts to get into Parliament, his experiences among the sharpers of New York and Melbourne—over all this ground does the happy old talker wander. But perhaps he is at his best when speaking of village life as he remembered it. Then he brings up pictures of the condition of villagers fifty or sixty years ago, before railways and Oxford Movements and sanitary associations had begun to turn everything topsy-turvy. In his own native country the religious life of the villagers depended on anything but the Established Churches. All her pulpits for miles round about were filled with careless relatives of the great landowners—men to whom hunting and dining were the chief end of life. The people kept out of church and went to chapel, where they received the food they needed from such earnest and pious men as Mr. Ritchie's own father, who was minister of one such congregation for over forty years. But this good thing had its drawback: it gave Christopher Crayon the idea that it was too much in earnest, too particular in training the young people and guarding them from sin. Hence, on two occasions, he says flatly:—"We had too much religion," and proceeds to a glorification of the world that is. One can quite understand that it was a great relief to him to at last get clear of the village life and go to Norwich where he could dabble in discussions and debates which savoured of heresy and were held by his associates as the sure way to becoming Unitarian, and where he could on one occasion actually attend a service at the Octagon Chapel. The fear and trembling that accompanied this toying with false doctrine ultimately disappeared, so that in the ripe old age of this book we have him saying: "We are now sublimely indifferent whether a preacher is orthodox or the reverse, whatever that may mean, so long as we feel his utterances are helpful in the way of Christian work and life." (James Clarke and Co. 3s. 6d.)

Scripture Contrasts.—The initials "J. W. P.," which are appended to some verses at the end of this pamphlet, will not be unfamiliar to old readers of THE INQUIRER. The learned author whom they indicate furnishes in these thirty-two pages the fruit of his industry in "comparing scripture with scripture." His point of view is best described in his concluding remarks: "There are never wanting," he says, "those who, to prop up their theory of an infallibly inspired whole Bible . . . try to reconcile all these obvious contradictions and contrasts. . . . But where is the difficulty of accepting these books as containing the words of a succession of various devout and earnest but fallible men, expressing their limited knowledge of subjects where we are all at fault, each according to his several ability? From which heaped-up ore let us extract what gold we can." The body of the essay consists of extracts taken from different parts of the Bible and set side by side in parallel columns.

In some cases the contrast of statement and opinion is absolute and material; in others, we imagine, a commentator by no means prejudiced might easily soften down the opposition apparent in the English version. But such a collection is obviously devised to startle the minds of the lazily acquiescent rather than to inform those who are already alert; at the same time many who are pretty well-read in the Scriptures may gain not a little from the suggestions to be found here. A TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

SIR,—Like Mr. R. Robinson, I am in favour of a twentieth century fund, and I think we shall miss a grand opportunity if we do not raise one. Whether it would be a blessing or a curse does not depend so much on how it will be spent, as whether it would unite or divide our ranks. The one thing to be avoided is a conflict of opinion on what to do with it.

I would suggest that a representative committee be formed at once to set the machinery in motion for raising the fund. This committee should consist of one or two representatives from each of the following bodies: our two colleges, the two sustentation funds, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Let it be understood that this committee shall have absolute discretion in disposing of the fund, and that their decision shall be final. This would obviate all preliminary discussion about what is to be done with the money when raised. Such a committee would be sure to possess wisdom enough to spend the fund wisely.

Anything this committee did with the money would satisfy me, whether they handed it all over to the B. and F., or divided it between the two colleges, or between the two sustentation funds, or divided it in equal or unequal portions among the lot.

How much should be aimed at? Mr. Robinson suggests £128,000. Let us say £150,000 or £200,000. I believe the raising of such a fund would do immense good to our Free Churches at the present, while the spending of it would produce untold blessings for the future. If such a fund is raised, I know a poorly paid minister (but knowing his natural modesty, I forbear to mention his name) who will give one guinea this year, and another when the new century dawns. I prefer guineas to pounds, as the odd shillings come in for incidental expenses.

A CORRECTION AND INQUIRY.

SIR,—I am sorry to find an error in the report of "English Presbyterians and Unitarians" in the last INQUIRER, which I certainly ought to have corrected before publication. The date of the Devonshire Assembly's decision not to require from candidates a declaration of belief in the doctrine of the Trinity was 1753. This date is given on the authority of James Manning and others. Unfortunately the minutes of the "United Brethren of Devon and Cornwall" (the Exeter Assembly) for this period are missing, although they are known to have been in existence thirty years ago. Can any of your readers give any information about them?

REMBRANDT.

THE WINTER EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

AMONG the Amsterdam arrangements for celebrating the accession of Queen Wilhelmina to the throne of Holland was an exhibition of the works of Rembrandt, the greatest of Dutch painters. As Holland possesses only twenty-five of the three hundred and fifty paintings known to be the works of the artist, most of the pictures exhibited came from English galleries. On the closing of the Amsterdam exhibition it was thought fitting to get together as many as possible of the returned pictures for the winter exhibition of our own Royal Academy. Though the great canvasses—"The Night-watch," "The Syndics," and "The Anatomical Lesson"—are not to be seen, the present exhibition is a magnificent collection, thoroughly representative of the master, and should not willingly be missed by any who take any interest in the development of art.

What is the chief effect these works have upon the mind of the spectator? No one will be smitten with the artist's delineation of beauty. It was not the aim of Rembrandt to emulate the work of the Grecian or Roman artists in their fine lines and forms of beauty. But he stands prominently above all other artists for his representation of powerful character and forcible expression. The classical artists invariably made expression subservient to beauty, whilst Rembrandt was convinced that the chief aim should be to depict truth and character. When the painter is determined that truth shall be his aim, he finds that the material for such work must be found in the things around him which he sees most and knows best. Consequently in the painting of Rembrandt we do not find delicate women lazily lounging about in the gardens of Arcadia, or wonderfully-dressed soldiers flourishing swords on imaginary battle-fields, but workers with wrinkled faces and rugged limbs—men and women who toil hard on the wharves of Amsterdam, and intellectual giants whose strongly-marked features belonged to his own particular friends. The pleasant, happy, but by no means beautiful face of his wife Saskia was often painted, but more frequent still do we find his own irregular, but powerful and mobile features presented to us in various guises. I suppose no man ever painted his own portrait more often than Rembrandt. I counted eleven autographic portraits in this present exhibition. This sounds like vanity. But, whilst it would be undoubted evidence of vanity in the case of most men, it does not appeal to you as such in Rembrandt. Some critic has said that when he wished to try a new method or style, he would experiment by making pictures of his own face; but one feels that it must rather have been that he found in his own features the characteristics which he was continually seeking. It was not the ideal that might be, but the real which he could find existing about him. We know him best as a portrait painter, and we recognise that very few have risen to his evel in showing on canvas the sitter's thought, experience, and soul.

The landscapes we know from his brush are very few. In them the windmill and other objects of his youth are prominent, and they are full of expression and poetic feeling.

It is, however, on Biblical subjects that the man is seen in his most characteristic phase. One is, perhaps, shocked on first looking at a few of these subjects, because one misses the soft, refined, and graceful outlines and brilliant colours so prevalent in early Italian and other orthodox religious art. We also shudder at first seeing such things as old Jacob in long Dutch trousers and leather boots, when he falls to the ground in horror at the sight of blood on Joseph's coat; or the representation of Jesus in a broad straw hat and large feather, with a spade in his right hand and garden implements in his belt. In "The Descent from the Cross," you feel there is something out of place when you notice a man looking on with indifference, in the dress of a kind of Dutch burgomaster, with turban and furred pelisse. But all these things, objectionable as they seem at first glance, grow in power the longer they are seen and considered. The works of the gentler Italians are so contrary to these of the vigorous Dutchman, that there seems on the surface nothing whatever in common between the two; but really there is the same reverence in Rembrandt as there is in Lippi or Angelico, though it was expressed so differently. Religion is the soul behind both these diverse exteriors. The Italians exhibited it in their beautifully soft painting of sweet angel faces; and the Dutchman in the sincerity and love with which he painted the seamed faces of the struggling old men, and the joy with which he showed the divine in the grass of the field, the hair on the horse's back, or the labour of the humblest mechanic.

His wonderful handling of light and shade is observed by everybody, for it is the most prominent feature of his work. Remembering how all his experiences influenced his work, one looks for an explanation of this in his life. We think of his earliest years, spent in the old mill of his father's on the banks of the Rhine, and fancy him painting in the darkened place with light coming in only from one small opening. It is no mere trick of art, but a method which the artist discovered as helpful in emphasising the thought of his work.

All his illustrations of Scripture story tell of the same spirit of the divine in everyday life. Jesus and the disciples are not men of any superior physical mould—they have no exaggerated beauty of face or form. They are fishermen, townspeople, painted from models well known to him. Ordinary men and women of Holland would, therefore, gather from these pictures that, at any rate, Rembrandt believed the toilers on the rivers and in the streets were capable of living lives as divine as the heroic men of Palestine who first preached the Gospel of Christ.

LUCKING TAVENER.

THE INWARD LIFE.

I KNOW not the way I am going,
But well do I know my Guide;
With a childlike trust do I give my hand
To the Mighty Friend by my side.
The only thing that I say to Him,
As He takes it, is "Hold it fast,
Suffer me not to lose my way,
And bring me home at last."

As when some helpless wanderer,
Alone in an unknown land,
Tells the guide his destined place of rest,
And leaves all else in his hand.
'Tis home, 'tis home that we wish to reach;

He who guides us may choose the way;
Little we heed what path we take,
If nearer home each day.—Anon.

We seek much after preachers; should we not much rather seek for the true ear? For surely there are preachers enough around us, preachers in heaven above, preachers on earth below, preachers within and preachers without. What does not the firmament alone preach to us! The clear blue heaven, or the same heaven covered with storm-clouds? The heavens declare the glory of God in the splendour of day, as in the magnificence of night. But how many hear?

How true it is, that till God speaks to the heart of man, man cannot understand the language of God, which is uttered around him, and over him, and beneath him. As there are times when we stand in the midst of Nature as if we were in a church when a joyful song of praise is springing from each breast, and we cannot help but sing also, being drawn into the stream of devotion, and carried along with it, so at other times, how mute all creation seems to us, as though all pursued its way alone, without a hand in heaven to guide it. All depends on whether God speaks in us.

"If God thy inmost soul and being share,
The universe becomes thy book of prayer."—Tholuck.

Only let us love God, and Nature will compass us about like a cloud of Divine witnesses, and all influences from the earth, and things on the earth, will be ministers of God to do us good. The breezes will whisper our souls into peace and purity; and in a valley, or from a hill-top, or looking along a plain, delight in beautiful scenery will pass into sympathy with that indwelling though unseen Spirit, of whose presence beauty is everywhere the manifestation, faint, indeed, because earthly. Then not only will the stars shed upon us light, but they will pour from heaven sublimity into our minds, and from on high will rain down thoughts to make us noble. God dwells in all things; and felt in a man's heart, He is then to be felt in everything else. Only let there be God within us, and then everything outside us will become a god-like help.—Euthanasy.

I think we are too ready with complaint
In this fair world of God's. Had we no hope

Indeed beyond the zenith and the scope Of yon grey blank of sky, we might grow faint

To muse upon eternity's constraint Round our aspirant souls; but since the scope

Must widen early, is it well to droop,
For a few days consumed in loss and taint?

O pusillanimous heart, be comforted,
And, like a cheerful traveller, take the road,

Singing beside the hedge. What if the bread

Be bitter in thine inn, and thou unshod
To meet the flints? At least, it may be said,

"Because the way is short, I thank Thee, God."—Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE days have lately been so warm and bright, that people said, "How springlike the weather is!" and, indeed, when one goes out and sees the bright sunshine on grass and hedgerow, one almost expects to find some pretty purple crocuses or delicate snowdrops peeping up through the dark moist mould in lanes and gardens. As a matter of fact, in some warm and sheltered parts of the country these flowers, and even some very early violets and primroses, have already been seen; but although we are glad to have them, we know perfectly well that their time has not really come, and our joy in the sweet blossoms is slightly marred by the thought that they cannot live long even in the atmosphere which we consider so mild. And we know, too, that the spring is not here yet—that we must look forward to cold winds and bleak frosty days, and to much boisterous weather generally before the warm airs of April blow, bringing their countless flowers. And yet, isn't it delightful to think that Nature is so full of life and beauty, that she must show some signs of her hidden treasure even in the dark months of winter?

It is as though she said to herself:—"Here are all these people shivering with cold, and talking about the leafless trees as if they did not believe that the sun would ever shine, or buds unfold again! Well, I must teach them something different from that! I must send a few warm bright days to cheer their hearts; I must freshen the withered grass a little, make the sky blue above, and touch their lips with soft moist winds in order that they may know how I think of them, and be assured that I have already begun my yearly work among the buried roots and bulbs." Isn't it delightful, I repeat, to be reminded in this way of the goodness and beauty of Nature?

Do you know, I think all of us, children and grown-up people alike, are apt to forget how many wonderful things are going on when we are grumbling—yes, really grumbling—about the dulness and cheerlessness of winter. Many of you, of course, have seen hyacinths growing in glasses; did you ever wonder what made those long white roots spring out of the dead-looking bulb, and feel their way downwards into the water, while, from the top, peeped forth three or four tightly wrapped points of delicate green, which presently opened out wider and wider till the bloom in their midst, slowly rising up and taking on the colours of its kind, was visible? And, while watching that marvellous process going on day after day, have you thought how exactly the same thing was happening in the garden outside—and not only in the garden, but in the woods and glades all over our bonny England, so that in a few months' time you would scarcely be able to walk in places which formerly looked so bare and desolate, without treading on flowers?

Now, I think this ought to teach us to be patient, and brave, and industrious as well; don't you? For if dear mother Nature is working for us so tenderly and untiringly, surely we ought to wish to do something in the world also, and try to make life more sweet and beautiful, as far as it lies in our power, both for ourselves and all around us.

I said that we often grumble when the days are cold and dreary. This reminds me of a little friend of mine—a robin—who sings on the topmost bough of an elder tree near my window. He comes there every morning, and I never hear his happy note without feeling more cheerful and bright. And there is one particular reason why I love this little bird so much—he always sings better in wet weather! Perhaps he loves the rain—at all events, when I am tempted to say, "What a wretched morning it is!" my robin plumes his wings on the dripping elder bush, and sings as though he could not sufficiently express his joy at being alive at all!

Well, perhaps, some of us cannot be quite as merry and cheery as that; but, at this season of the year, when (although if we believe what the calendar says, we are still in the midst of winter) the days are now and then so beautiful and springlike, we certainly have every reason to feel joyous-hearted; for we know that this is only the merest hint and foretaste of all the light and loveliness which we may expect during the months to come. And so may the New Year, which has begun so favourably, be a very happy New Year for you all!

THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

THE Holy Catholic Church, according to the original meaning of the term Catholic, is simply "the holy Church throughout all the world," of the Te Deum, or "the Universal Church," as it is elsewhere called in the Prayer-book. Referring to this primary meaning of the word, in his "Creed and Life," the Rev. C. E. BEEBY quotes the following passage from JEWEL'S "Apology for the Church of England":—"We believe that there is one Church of God, and that not confined, as it was heretofore, to the Jewish people, and in one angle or kingdom, but that it is Catholic and universal, and so diffused or spread over the face of the whole earth; that there is no nation which can justly complain that it is excluded, and cannot be admitted into the Church and people of God." And in like manner the divines of the Westminster Assembly declared that "the visible Church, which is also Catholique and universal under the Gospel (not confined to one nation, as before under the Law), consists of all those throughout the world that profess the true religion."

If, therefore, we desire to know more of the character of such a Catholic Church, we must ask what is meant by profession of "the true religion." The Westminster Confession furnishes one decided answer, with little affinity to that which would be given by the extreme party of sacerdotalists in the Anglican Church to-day, dubbed by Mr. BEEBY "the very particular Catholics." The Roman Catholics, again, would have their own unmistakable answer.

But for those who find the essence of religion not in any one dogmatic form, nor yet in the claims of any one ecclesiastical authority, the answer will be different from all these. The Church of God, "the Catholic Church," is the gathering of those, "throughout all the world," who acknowledge Him, and are united in the common desire of worship. Wherever, therefore, two or three are gathered together, or as many thousands, overshadowed by a sense of the Divine Presence, surrendered to God in the spirit of worship, there is a Church of the living God; and of all such, united in that one profession of true religion, we may say that they are the Catholic Church of God.

The term gains its deeper meaning of universal in charity and in spiritual sympathy, when that one surrender is seen to unite together all worshippers of God, notwithstanding differences of doctrinal belief. There is something deeper than such dividing lines of thought, and that is the sense of kinship, of spiritual unity in all who understand that they are children of God and therefore brethren of one household, surrendered to the same care, seeking the same light, worshipping the one God and FATHER of all. Men may be as yet very far from unity in their thought of God, but if they make no dogmatic claim to finality and exclusive possession of the truth, if they recognise amid their differences a common purpose and a common reverence, and acknowledge that all alike are in the same care, and desire to be led in a progressive spiritual life to clearer knowledge and firmer faith, then are they members together in the one Catholic Church of God. Unitarian and Trinitarian may acknowledge that deeper unity, even while in habitual worship they must still be gathered into separate congregations; they are united in the common prayer to be confirmed in the true life and to be led into more perfect knowledge of the truth.

To the dogmatist such a conception of the Catholic Church of God seems vague and unsatisfactory; but it is an ideal that may kindle the ardour of all spiritually-minded men, and which, if fully accepted, must make an end of the bitterness of theological antipathies, and by setting mind and heart in the right attitude towards all questions of religious life, must work effectually towards that clearer vision of truth and growing unity in the thought of God, which dogmatic zeal on various sides so fatally prevents. They who accept this ideal are not made indifferent to truth or to the growth and faithful labours of their own particular community in the Church. They are rather called to more strenuous zeal—only in the right direction, that they may be worthy of their place in the greater fellowship, and do the work to which they are called. They understand that the Church is not of their own making, but is of God; and they are called to more complete surrender, since they must be led not in their own way, but His. With a new reverence they will open their minds to truth, to receive all the light that He may give; with a new devotion they will pour out their hearts in worship, and with a new humility pray that His will may be done, because there is nothing for them to do in their own strength, but He may use them for the highest ends. There are differing gifts, and differences of administration, but the one Spirit—and in that Spirit all things will be found to work together for good. Each community must rejoice in its own gifts, and its own measure of truth, not in self-conceit, but because they are gifts of the Spirit, by the faithful use of which, and joy in them, the way opens for the receiving of yet more, and the perfecting of faithful service.

Is not this conception of the Catholic Church, the Church universal, in harmony with the spirit of CHRIST, and therefore most truly Christian? To trust in the FATHER, to love Him, to pray to Him, to live as His children in the world—that was the very heart of the religion of JESUS; and if we think how it would be if he were again amongst us, as he was among his own people nineteen centuries ago, would he not be joined with us in that same trust and aspiration and teach us anew the meaning of that perfect love, which casts out fear?

The new Evangelical Catechism says that the Holy Catholic Church is "that holy society of believers in CHRIST JESUS which He founded, of which He is the only Head, and in which He dwells by His Spirit; so that, though made up of many communions, organised in various modes, and scattered throughout the world, it is yet one in Him." We would rather say that it is one in the FATHER, to whom JESUS prayed and taught us to pray, and that it is the society of those who have learnt with JESUS to trust in God, the FATHER of all, the One Eternal Spirit. The Catechism says that the mark of a true branch of the Catholic Church is "the presence of CHRIST, through His indwelling Spirit, manifested in holy life and fellowship"; and in a previous answer it has been said that JESUS CHRIST carries on his work of salvation "by the third person in the blessed Trinity, the Holy Spirit, who was sent forth at Pentecost." To us it appears that the spirit of JESUS is a spirit of meekness and reverence and trust, and of love such as a child bears to the FATHER, and such as makes a perfect brotherhood; but when we speak of JESUS and are drawn into religious fellowship with him, we cannot separate him from God. The Spirit of the FATHER wrought in him, and in each succeeding generation, in spite of all the theologians have said, has borne witness that in him is the true spirit of sonship, which is the ideal of our religious life.

The Holy Catholic Church lives in the power of the SPIRIT. Orthodoxy, still striving for lucid utterance in the new Catechism, seems to speak of that Spirit sometimes as "the third person of the blessed Trinity," but more often as CHRIST, setting him in the place of God. Learning of JESUS, we say it is our FATHER, who is the Giver of all life and all spiritual grace and enlightenment, therefore also the Giver to us of this spiritual companionship with JESUS, the chief of faithful souls, and of our place as children in the household of God.

THE PULPIT.

SPIRITUAL SUFFICIENCY.*

"Who is sufficient for these things?"—2 Cor. ii. 16.

"Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to account anything as from ourselves; but our sufficiency is from God."—Ib. iii. 5.

In the temperament of St. Paul there struggled for pre-eminence, mastery, and, if possible, reconciliation, two sharply antagonistic sides: on the one hand, the sense of a divine commission, a divine right to preach the Gospel and win souls from sin and error to righteousness and true doctrine; on the other, an overwhelming feeling of personal weakness, lack of qualifications for so immense a task—insufficiency, almost unworthiness. The man who, after he had, by whatever means, become convinced of his own apostolate, disappeared for a number of years in the desert of Arabia—taking flight, it would seem, from the mission laid upon him; the man who could on one occasion refer to himself as the chief of sinners and on another acknowledge his unfitness to be called an apostle; the man who admitted that his bodily presence was weak and his speech contemptible, while his only strength lay in writing, and who moreover appears to allude to a distressing physical affliction—certainly betrays in actions and words such as these a deep consciousness of being unequal to the task confided to him. And yet there was in him also a feeling diametrically opposite to that just described: a feeling of power that belonged, yet did not belong, to him as a mere man—a proud and almost exultant sense of authority, a conviction of the reality of his apostleship, which finds vent in such words as "I reckon that I am not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles," and other similar assertions of his indefeasible right to that title and position, and his intention to abide by it, submitting to those who might in any wise dispute it—no, not for an hour.

Thus he pursues his work, now one and now the other of these moods prevailing in his mind; now despondently conscious of his scanty strength and the gigantic nature of the enterprise he has set before himself, and anon prepared to defend his fitness, nay, his entire sufficiency for it, against all comers. Ever striving after a conciliation of these two opposites, he but rarely attains it; for St. Paul's mind was by nature more suited to bringing out and accentuating contradictions than to harmonising them: what he delights in are sharp, antithetical movements, the distinct setting over against each other of unbridgeable contrasts—the Law and the Gospel, Works and Faith—and his whole system is made up of elements which have never become properly fused and blended, but predominate alternately, one giving place to the other with an abruptness sometimes bewildering.

The temperament of St. Paul is certainly an exceptional and unusually complex one: his past had been storm-tossed, he had gone "through terror and through cataclysm of soul"—had from a cruel persecutor of the infant Church become its doughtiest champion. He belonged to those passionate, volcanic natures who have to fight their spiritual struggles again and again, have to do battle with resurgent doubt, are subject to fits of profound dejection and self-despair varied by ecstatic and visionary moods, and consequently not destined to attain that calm serenity of a faith which has left all uncertainty behind, that settled attitude of unalterable assurance which sees—or fancies that it sees—every problem resolved, every difficulty explained, every mystery become translucent, each taking its place in a coherent system.

Nevertheless, making allowances for gifts so great as to place him into a category by himself, and for a mental constitution so uncommon that it can scarcely be understood by normal men, there is yet in these mingled or alternating feelings of sufficiency and insufficiency, self-distrust and reliance, something in which every teacher of religion will recognise—if at least his religion is at all a reality—an experience of his own. He may not be set apart to win multitudes of unbelievers to a new faith—he is scarcely called upon to endure persecution and ill-treatment, or to answer with life and limb for the opinions he holds. All the tremendous anxieties, the wearing toil and peril which made up the every-day fortunes of the apostle's life are taken off his shoulders—he has no new movement to inaugurate, no pioneer's work to do, only faithfully and according to his ability to continue what his predecessors have begun. As to doctrine, he finds himself, not the bold proclaimer of tenets such as the world has never heard until his time, but either, as in the majority of churches, the exponent of an authoritative creed, or as in a minority who acknowledge no such binding symbol, at least in substantial agreement with the opinions held by the members of his communion, and unhampered in his development.

And yet—prosaic to the verge of common-placeness as the modern minister's lot may be in comparison with that of the apostle, there is that in his office which will cause him—unless he is a very bold or a very unthinking man—to enter it with much hesitancy, much diffidence, which will make him think and think again of the nature of the duties to which he vows himself, ere he finally undertakes them. He is in by far the larger number of cases below the zenith of life and the experience life brings; yet he will be called upon to address on the deep things of God those who are vastly more ripened in thought than himself, some who were mature men and women when he was in his cradle, and whom he can hardly think of teaching without a strong sense of incongruity, a feeling of positions reversed. He has yet to learn more even than he himself imagines—and is to give instruction, and that continuously. He finds himself holding a set of pretty well defined religious opinions; but unless his outlook has been a preternaturally narrow one, he cannot but be aware that these opinions are not shared by many whom by no illusion or trick of conceit he can fail to recognise as his superiors in every imaginable respect; and these opinions of his it will be his office, for which he is set apart, to proclaim, to spread if he can, to defend against any attacks. At one time he may have thought that the special theological training of which he was the recipient would in a large measure fit him for his task; but now, as he envisages the practical realities of the case, he is brought to recognise, not only how scant a store of knowledge he has accumulated during his years of preparation, but also how very short a way this kind of knowledge will carry him in the fulfilment of his duties.

But these, after all, are the minor considerations, the lesser scruples among those that present themselves to him; immeasurably weightier is the further question which he is bound to face, and which completely overbalances that of merely intellectual culture. It is one of the chief parts of his functions to set before those who have called him to minister among them a lofty ideal of conduct, to incite them to all virtuous and godly living, to denounce sin and wrongdoing, to encourage them to battle against temptation, to wage warfare against every form of evil, to exalt truth and honour as being more worthy his hearers' allegiance than pleasure and self-indulgence. This he is to do with all the power, all the earnestness, all the insistence whereof he is capable: must he not ask himself—By what right? Can he pretend, even to the outside world, that he is so much purer, so much holier, so much superior to besetting sin, that his words will strike home with the decupled force of example? Has he triumphed over temptation, made no compromises with selfishness, trodden each unworthy impulse victoriously underfoot? Alas! God and his own soul know the answer. He is but the average mortal, conscious to the full of defects and mistakes and failures—yet is to stand forth and deliver his message, preach a code and standard of practical ethics necessarily higher than any he can flatter himself with having attained to.

Finally, it is for him to preach the great facts of faith, giving forth no uncertain sound, as one who has a firm and assured grasp upon the eternal verities, whose eye is steadily fixed upon the spiritual Reality behind the passing and evanescent show. He is to inculcate a steady trust in the underlying goodness of this world, to help others to bear their burdens and trials, to offer the consolations of religion to those who are any ways afflicted or distressed; and here again he cannot but feel the want of experience inseparable from youth, and St. Paul's simple words, "Brethren, I count not myself yet to have apprehended" . . . "not that I have already attained or am already made perfect," rise to his mind with almost intolerable intensity. Can you wonder if, thus surveying his duties and comparing them with his capacities, the old cry should irresistibly force itself upon his lips—"Who is sufficient for these things?"

I cannot pretend to be surprised at the mental attitude—though I entirely repudiate it—of those who, convinced of their own inadequacy, seek to have that which they know to be lacking in themselves, supplied by external means, such as an ordination supposed to impart a grace and authority more than natural, covering their human infirmities and making them fit and proper mouthpieces to proclaim the oracles of God. Entirely explicable as I deem such an attitude to be, it yet appears to me also an utterly mistaken one, and entirely foreign to the spirit of the apostle. It was not in this direction, in the direction of having the question of his apostolate settled by a formally correct ceremony, that St. Paul's mind turned when he had to face the problem of his own insufficiency. Not upon rites and formulas did he stake the validity of his "holy orders," but could exclaim in a moment of profound insight and while humbly acknowledging his own weakness, "Our sufficiency is from God!"

Boastful, no doubt, so the apostle's adversaries would consider such an assertion, the presumptuous arrogance of one who did not scruple to lay claim to direct inspiration from on high; yet the assertion was not only compatible with the most unaffected modesty, but its direct outcome. Not to himself did St. Paul attribute the magnificent success which attended his work—who was he to achieve such results, an obscure artisan, conscious of no particular accomplishments, of mean presence and little eloquence? If he accomplished anything at all, it was but as an inspired tool in the hands of the Most High, working out His purposes through no gift or merit of his own, except that of making himself an obedient instrument to be wielded as his Master chose. Thus the same writer who in one place moans "Oh, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me out of this body of death?" can proudly asseverate in another "I can do all things, through Him that strengtheneth me!" Thus it is that where others would have faltered or turned back, he strove on with unalterable resolve, persuading, organising, rebuking, befriending, overcoming innumerable hindrances, enemies within and without the fold; thus it is that he might well have said with the "very bold" Prophet Isaiah, as he characteristically calls him, "The Lord God will help me; therefore have I not been confounded: therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed."

My friends, it is only in this spirit of St. Paul that a man can with any seriousness, with any hopefulness, undertake that office of the ministry which I am this day beginning among you. Self-sufficiency is the unmistakable mark of that "barren levity of mind" which more than in any other vocation is deplorable in this one. Not, therefore, relying upon any excellency of speech or human powers and faculties do I come before you; these, even where they exist, are but adventitious aids, externals, and of themselves unable to give vital power, efficiency, and sufficiency to a minister's work: such a measure of sufficiency, be it great or small, as I may ever be able to show forth, must be from God alone, due to His inbreathing. Not as arrogating to myself a deeper wisdom, a greater holiness, a superior authority shall I strive to set before you His Truth, but only as it reflects itself more or less clearly in my soul and mind. Not as having attained or apprehended, but as pressing forward to the mark of our common high calling, shall I endeavour to preach the beauty of holiness, the ideal life, the limitless goodness of God, the indissoluble union between our finite spirits and the Infinite Spirit in whom and of whom we are.

This sufficiency which is from God is ministered variously, according to the ways of His providence, now in greater and now in lesser portions, differing at divers times and in divers persons; all we can do is to make ourselves fit vessels for receiving His spirit, ready and willing to be blessed by the incoming of His grace. Trusting in Him and invoking His succour, I pray that I may be found worthy of my office, strong in the fulfilment of duty, ready to obey the heavenly vision. I know that no willingness, no good intention, will save me from imperfections and mistakes, since it is the will and decree of Almighty God that through our mistakes and stumblings and failures shall we learn the business of life, and that each man must win his own experience, no one else's availing him. But I know also that you, my friends, will give me your help and advice in our common work; that we shall try to understand each other; that where your patience or your forbearance may be needed, you will not withhold it from one who readily acknowledges himself very fallible, very inexperienced, but very anxious to promote to the best of his powers the good estate of this Church of which we are members.

My whole programme, if the term is not too pretentious to be admitted, consists in the determination to keep steadily in view a wise counsel once given to me by one well qualified to guide his younger brethren: "Remember that your business is to minister and to edify." To minister is to serve; to edify is to build up. The minister is not a priest, the ordained channel of the means of grace, the mediator between man and God, but the servant of his congregation appointed to perform a service which, if he discharges it faithfully, may well make him proud and happy. For that service is the building up of souls, the strengthening of the foundations of character, the raising up of temples of the living God, the carving in golden letters of the words of life upon the tables of the human heart. To that service I humbly and gladly pledge myself to-day in your presence; may He endue me with patience and skill, and give durability to the work, who is the Great Master Builder, God in all and through all and above all. AMEN.

NOTES FROM MADRAS.—II.

DURING my stay in Madras I have preached every Sunday evening at the Brahmopasana Mandir to overflowing congregations which more than filled the sitting accommodation, many being compelled to stand. These congregations have been made up, mainly, of graduates and undergraduates. Our Brahmo friends tell me that one notable and welcome feature is the fact that Brahmins and non-Brahmins of various castes sit side by side and freely mingle in the service. On week-evenings I have lectured in the Mandir on Channing, Parker, Priestley, Emerson, Martineau, on "The Beliefs of a Unitarian," on "The Old and the New in Religion," on the question, "Does Modern Knowledge banish God from the World?" These lectures have been attended by audiences of from seventy to ninety. One highly gratifying feature is the eagerness with which the literature of the B. and F.U.A. is constantly asked for and taken. The largest supply of tracts and pamphlets is soon exhausted. The cry is still and incessantly for more. I have never met anywhere such living and absorbing interest in the study of the fundamental religious questions. It is impossible to measure the influence which the B. and F.U.A. is exercising in freely supplying India with its literature. Again and again I have met with Hindus who have told me of the intellectual and moral help which they have received from our publications. Mr. Armstrong's book on "God and the Soul"—a book for the mind of young India—is constantly applied for, and is proving to be fruitful seed cast into good ground. What, too, would be of invaluable service would be a cheap book giving a summary of Dr. Martineau's philosophical, ethical, and religious teaching. "The Types of Ethical Theory" is the text-book for the M.A. degree in philosophy in the Madras University, but the students cannot afford to buy it, and are reluctantly compelled to content themselves with the expositions of it by the Professor. A book of selections from Martineau, especially of his arguments against materialism, positivism, and scientific agnosticism, would be a supreme aid to thousands of minds; and a very low-priced edition of "The Seat of Authority in Religion" would prove a veritable gospel in the present critical period in religion in India.

Outside the Brahmopasana Mandir I have given so many solicited lectures that it requires an effort in arithmetic to count them up! As I think of it I feel that I am chargeable with a not inconsiderable degree of boldness in appearing so many times before the Madras public, but some share of this audacity must be laid at the door of local Colleges and literary Associations. I have lectured on Matthew Arnold at the Presidency College, with Professor Russell, M.A., in the chair; at the Pachappa's College on Buddha, with Mr. Justice Subramany Iyer in the chair; at the Anderson Hall on Carlyle, with Professor Runga Chariar, M.A., in the chair; at the Wesleyan College on Charles Kingsley, with Professor W. A. Hoare, M.A., in the chair; at the Chintadrippeta Young Men's Union on "Darwin: The Man and his Work," with Dr. F. W. Nair in the chair. Inclusive of these, fourteen lectures have been delivered in all in various parts of Madras. In each case the subjects were asked for. Two of them were theological—one to the Saidapet Literary Association at the Saidapet Teachers' College, on "Man's Origin, Nature, and Destiny," with Colonel Olcott, the well-known Theosophist, in the chair; the other at the Madras Debating Society, on the question, "Will Religion be Outgrown as Humanity Advances?" It will be seen that some of the other lectures mentioned afforded the opportunity of presenting the liberal views of religion. The attendance at these lectures has varied from 250 to 500. On most of these occasions your correspondent has been "garlanded"—an Indian way of expressing appreciation. It consists of placing around the neck and over the breast a massive circlet of flowers, arranged with the most exquisite taste. It is a pleasant method of uttering the feelings of grateful hearts. The lecture on Buddha has appeared in the Fellow-Worker, the journal of the Southern India Brahmo Somaj. At the request of the Editor a contribution explanatory of Unitarianism has appeared in the Christian Patriot—a Madras Tripartite weekly paper—with a large circulation among European and Native Christians, and a “leader” on the contribution is written in excellent tone and spirit. The Hindu—a Madras daily—has published an article on “A Comparative Study of Religions.”

One of the most interesting features of my work consists of almost daily interviews with inquiring young men—sometimes to the number of five or six per day—who come to discuss questions of religion. Their minds are most active, alert, and subtle on modern problems in theology. Under the influence of Western agnostic literature they have lost their ancient faith, and they are all out at sea, without chart, compass, or anchor. It is to these that Mr. Armstrong's book affords harbourage, and such a selection as I have suggested from Dr. Martineau would be a haven of religious faith. I am assured by Brahmo friends that these conversations are of assistance to not a few.

The Brahmo Somaj in Madras is not strong numerically, but it numbers among its members some earnest and devoted spirits who carry on its work with unwearied fidelity. It is engaged, too, in philanthropic and educational work in its “Brahmo Orphan Asylum Press” and in its Ragged School. This last-named institution had about 300 pupils, but the Government requirements as to space necessitated a reduction, and there are now about 200 scholars. The children come from very poor families, and the school is maintained by Government grants and the subscription of friends. Some evening classes for elementary technical training have been started. The devotion of the headmaster is highly spoken of.

One great and urgent want of the Somaj here is a regular minister. With a stationed preacher I have no doubt that the congregation would grow rapidly. I do not mean that the roll of membership would increase. The sympathisers with Brahmoism in Madras are much more numerous than the attendants at the Mandir. But with a capable leader the number of the latter would mount up. At present the evidence is incontestable that Brahmo ideas are held by many Hindus in Madras who will not surrender their Brahminical rituals and ceremonies. I have met with Brahmins who say: “Yes, we are at one with the Somaj and with your Unitarianism so far as regards their and your conceptions of religion, but we will not give up our Brahminical rules and forms, our material representations of God, and our worship of what you call ‘idols,’ which are no idols to us, but only helps to the realisation of the Unseen and Spiritual.” This combination of liberalism in intellectual conclusions with what we in England know as High Churchism in practice, is one of the greatest obstacles to the growth of the Brahmo Somaj in Madras as a distinct religious body. In every sense, and emphatically in a religious sense, Madras is described as the most stubbornly conservative and orthodox of the three Presidency towns. Still, with a minister of intellectual ability, philosophical attainments, and spiritual fervour at the Mandir, the principles of Brahmoism would become more widely known throughout the Madras community, and very, very slowly, no doubt, but surely, the customs and usages of Brahminism, rooted in the Hindu mind for centuries, and not, therefore, to be changed suddenly, would be modified. The Brahmo Somaj of Madras is financially unable to appoint a minister, but it is hoped that one result of the Theistic Conference to be held in Madras this week will be the allotment to Southern India of a missionary leader.

THE BIRMINGHAM UNITARIAN BROTHERLY BENEFIT SOCIETY.

We suggested, in a recent letter on Midland matters, that at some future time we should send to THE INQUIRER some account of the Birmingham Unitarian Brotherly Benefit Society, the centenary of which had then been recently celebrated. And now that the Editor calls upon me for an article, I can think of nothing more interesting to write about. I am not going to attempt anything in the nature of a detailed history; that will be obtainable in a pamphlet which my friend, Mr. Albert Derrington, the president of the Society, is to publish shortly.

The movement out of which it grew was set on foot by certain teachers in the Old and New Meeting Schools, who in 1790 decided to form, at their own expense, a society for the further instruction of those youths, who might honourably leave the Sunday-school, in writing, arithmetic, geography, natural and revealed religion. In the following year occurred the Birmingham Riots, during which the Old and New Meeting Churches were destroyed by the intelligent mob. The schools were in consequence thoroughly disorganised, and the teachers' scheme fell through for the time. So soon, however, as the wave of popular passion had spent itself the congregations speedily regathered and set to work to repair the damage. In 1796 the Birmingham Brotherly Society was formed, which, while not losing sight of the original scheme, had, as its main object, to supply schools with a succession of gratuitous teachers, whom it associated for the purpose of general improvement in knowledge and virtue. A somewhat remarkable feature, considering recent experiences, was that its membership was open to all Sunday-school teachers of the town of whatever denomination. Needless to record, none joined who did not belong to the two churches, and in 1807 the name was altered to “The Old and New Meeting Brotherly Benefit Society.” “Unitarian” was added after Newhall Hill came into existence. Regular and punctual attendance to school duties was secured by a system of fines for inexcusable absence. Ordinary teachers were mulcted in $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for each half day; managers in 1d. Absence for three whole days, without sufficient reason, involved liability to expulsion. The subjects appointed for study at the meetings were reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, drawing, natural, civil, and sacred history, and morals, or “whatever may be generally useful to a manufacture or as furnishing principles for active benevolence and integrity.” Following the rules is this declaration which everyone had to sign on joining, the spirit and expression of which seem to me alike admirable:—

Such being the leading motives for our association, we pledge ourselves to each other to endeavour to carry them into effect.

We will endeavour to make ourselves as useful as we can, and will be careful that our example for steadiness and general propriety be such as will be proper for imitation to the best of our judgment. We engage to behave with civility and respect to each other, to consider each other as desirable companions and brothers, to go hand in hand in our improvements and amusements, and to study each other's welfare and happiness.

We will avoid all levity or trifling, unmanly behaviour, all finery and foppishness in our dress, all bad company and gaming.

We will consider industry in all our callings as an indisputable duty, and obedience to parents or masters as not less necessary or binding.

We will love and cultivate honesty and truth, and in every respect strive to gain the confidence of our friends and the esteem of all who know us.

With these sincere and good intentions we subscribe our names to the foregoing rules.

The entire management of the schools soon passed into the hands of this society, and remained there for many years. The advantages of the arrangement were by no means inconsiderable. For it was ensured that the teachers made some effort to fit themselves for their work; that they should be persons of good character; and that they should be punctual and regular in the discharge of their duties. In 1831 when the Jubilee of Sunday-schools was celebrated in Birmingham, there were 1,364 pupils, and 150 teachers in the Old and New Meeting Sunday-schools. It is well known that not a few of the City's prominent men owe their early education, and, therefore, probably their subsequent position, to the splendid work that was done in these schools. In the making of what is best in modern Birmingham they have played a not inconspicuous or inglorious part.

Under the date June 18, 1798, there appears in the Minute Book this entry: “Established a Benefit Society, the members of the Brotherly Society unanimously agreeing to act as a perpetual committee and to submit to the necessary trouble without any gratuity.” The object, of course, was to provide weekly help for members in case of sickness, and to make a payment towards funeral expenses at death. It would be difficult to over-estimate the service which this society has rendered, or the debt of gratitude which is owing to its founders. I can only give a few, but those sufficiently striking, figures. For the first year the contributions amounted to £30 7s. 8½d., the payments on account of sickness to £30 13s. 4d., leaving a deficit of 5s. 7½d. But thenceforward until 1854 the receipts continuously exceeded the payments. By this means a large capital was gradually built up. The total surplus balance for the sixty years ending in 1858 amounted to £2,063 17s. 5½d. In the forty years from 1859 to 1898 the accounts reveal a different order of things, for there is a total deficiency of £5,746 13s. 6d. During the hundred years of its existence subscriptions have amounted to £18,299 2s. 6d., and payments to £25,606 1s. 3d. In other words, the officers have been able to distribute in benefits £7,306 13s. 9d. more than the members have paid in subscriptions. They have been enabled to do this, of course, by means of interest on their invested capital, the basis of which was firmly laid in the earlier years by the foresight and self-sacrifice of the members, many of whom were more anxious to build up a strong society than to reap from it any personal benefit. To-day that capital stands at £13,407 7s. 5d. There are 569 members, 119 under 21 years of age, 450 above. For adults the weekly subscription is 6d.; and the benefits in case of sickness are as follows:—For 78 weeks, from 14s. to 20s., according to age; for 78 weeks more, from 7s. to 10s.; for the remainder of the illness, from 3s. 6d. to 5s., which may practically amount to a pension. The funeral allowance ranges from £8 to £16.

In 1821 there was started the Old and New Meeting Casual Fund. Its object was to aid members of the schools of the Brotherly Society by gifts of money or loans in case of temporary distress; by loans free of interest of £5 to £10 or more towards the purchase of tools, or to aid in commencing business. The capital now stands at £270; and altogether £3,203 has been lent. Later the fines exacted by the society were appropriated for benevolent purposes, part of them being devoted to the assistance of public institutions.

With so cursory a statement I leave this part of my subject, and proceed to what is of even more interest, from one point of view, a few thumbnail sketches of persons. Rule 8 of the society reads: "No one to leave the society without two months' notice, when a general inquiry shall be made into his behaviour and improvements in the society, as well as his character in the world at large, and such remarks as the majority shall determine, shall be entered in the register book of the society." I find that it would be dangerous to publish names, as some of the descendants of those characterised are now living, and they might not in every instance be flattered by, or even concur in the written estimate of their near ancestors. Those who drew up and adopted the sketches knew nothing of fear or favour. They put on record just what they were aware of and believed.

We gain a somewhat interesting insight into the hardship of the apprenticeship system of the early years of the century. The society would tolerate no revolt against its harsh conditions. They approve of one whose "conduct as an apprentice was admirable; for though treated with severity, he bore it with patience, and kept himself from every imputation of blame by persevering in the discharge of his duties until the expiration of his time." Of another it was reported that he attempted to abscond his master's service. The society resolved that such conduct was improper, and that he be requested to make some concessions. When he refused, although they put on record that they had reason to think highly of him, they at once expelled him. A third case can, at this distance of time, scarcely fail to provoke a smile. The worst they can say as to character is that the young man in question overrated his abilities. They go on: "We regret that it should appear on the society's minutes that he clandestinely left his apprenticeship which had still some months to run, that he engaged in His Majesty's service as a mariner, was marched to Portsmouth, where after two months' illness in one of the King's hospitals, he expired in the course of last week. We have wished this brief statement should be admitted as a caution to others by their observing how bitter the fruits may be of a short indiscretion."

Here are two commonplace persons hit off in a sentence each. "Honest, quiet, and inoffensive, little either to blame or praise, but well disposed upon the whole." "Without much display of energy he had generally conducted himself with propriety, and though not much qualified by disposition or study to fill his station in the society with advantage, he may nevertheless prove a plain honest character in future life." Of another it is recorded: "This was a singular character, and the less we have to say of him the more confident we shall be of its truth. We may, perhaps, venture to affirm that his attainments were small, and that he had something mean in his disposition." That is not exactly an estimate of a grandfather that would be highly prized to-day. What, then, would be the feelings of the present generation towards those who thus wrote of their forbears: "The principal features of his character were easiness of temper, a love of sensual pleasures, and a disregard of truth. In his connection with the schools, a period of about fourteen years, he evinced an amicable disposition united with sufficient energy to make his own improvement easy and pleasant, and to render his services satisfactory and valuable. Such was his character. View him now, the associate of drunkards and reprobates; his good resolutions have forsaken him; he is become the slave of folly and the dupe of profligates. Such is his character"? There is a distinct touch of humour in the expression of opinion as to the real cause of a resignation. "The reason he assigns for leaving is, that he wishes to attend another place of worship—namely, Paradise-street Meeting. It does not appear to us, however, that he was led to change from a conviction of any religious truth, but that he was principally, if not altogether, drawn by the attraction of a female object to whom he had lately been married without the knowledge of his parents, and before the expiration of his apprenticeship." It must not be supposed that the society was narrow in spirit. The following entry makes impossible any such idea:—"The conduct of this young man merits the highest encomiums. For nearly three years he filled the office of teacher with unwearied diligence and equal success; and his example of steadiness and general propriety was truly worthy of imitation. Nor were his reasons for leaving the connection less honourable to himself, or less deserving of commendation on the part of the society. His mind having been impressed with sentiments of a religious nature, he conceived an opinion that the particular tenets of the society to which his class belonged were not so well founded as theirs of the Baptist persuasion. He, therefore, relinquished his connection with us to join the Cannon-street Society. While we regret the loss of such a member, we applaud the motives which dictated his resignation." At the same time they did not hold their own views lightly. In dealing with a similar case they end by saying: "We cannot conceal our regret that the benevolent religion of Jesus Christ should in any case assume a form which compels the professors to hold themselves apart from their fellow Christians merely on the ground of supposed misapprehension. The religious opinions professed by the general body of this society we are not anxious to intrude upon others; we cannot, however, but congratulate ourselves upon holding a creed which not only permits but enjoins us to be in charity with all men."

The space at my disposal has not permitted me to give these characterisations in full, nor will it allow me to add more. Enough has been said, I think, to make us think with pride of these men of an earlier day, so full of enthusiasm for their cause, so entirely honest and independent in their judgments, so loyal to their faith, so liberal in their spirit.

ADDISON A. CHARLESWORTH.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham: Small Heath (Presentations).

—On Thursday, Jan. 19, by kind invitation of Mr. J. H. Forrester, Chairman of the Bazaar Committee, about 100 of the stallholders and other helpers at the late bazaar assembled at the Old Meetings School Room, which had been carpeted and decorated for the occasion. Among those present were the Revs. J. Wood, A. A. Charlesworth, and H. H. Johnson, Messrs. E. L. Tyndall, G. Titterton, and W. H. Nightingale. After tea Mr. J. H. Forrester presided, and congratulatory speeches were made by several friends on the success of the bazaar, at which the total receipts were £794 18s. 10d., and the net profit £614 10s. 7d. A handsome clock and side ornaments were presented to Mr. J. P. P. Dufield, the bazaar secretary, in recognition of his successful exertions. The evening was enlivened by songs and music. A fortnight previously the members of the congregation presented the Rev. John Harrison with a gold Albert chain as a mark of esteem for his services while missionary agent of the Midland Christian Union.

Bradford.—On Monday night a lecture was given to the members of the Chapel Lane Literary Society by Mr. W. Claridge, M.A., chairman of the Bradford School Board, on "Modern Jerusalem." Mr. Claridge described the first impression of visitors to Jerusalem as one of intense disappointment at its present condition, considering the associations of the place. The city was very small, and its streets were narrow, ill-paved, not lighted, insanitary, and generally in a deplorable state of decay, whilst squalor and misery were everywhere manifest amongst the people. But there were, of course, apart from these characteristics, many features of absorbing interest, and he went on to give an account of a visit, amongst other places, to the Mosque of Omar, the supposed remains of Solomon's temple, and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, with its gross superstitions and travesty of religious observances. The view of Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives was one of the most superb sights in the world. Mr. Claridge also described the wailing-place of the Jews, where the poorest section of the people assembled every Friday to kiss the walls of the ancient temple and pray for the restoration of the glory of their fallen kingdom; and he dwelt in a most interesting manner upon many other curious aspects of modern life in Jerusalem. During the evening a programme of sacred music was rendered. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., presided.

Cardiff.—On Sunday, Jan. 15, the services at West Grove were conducted by Mr. Promotho Ioll Sen. At the evening service Mr. Sen gave a graphic and interesting account of the Brahmo-Somaj movement in India, and was listened to with great attention by a good congregation. On the following Wednesday the annual Sunday-school party was held, and passed off most successfully. Altogether about 120 persons sat down to tea, and quite a large number afterwards joined the party. A programme of songs and recitations, mostly by the children themselves, was followed by a lantern entertainment. Prizes were afterwards distributed, and a short time spent in games, &c., concluded a most successful meeting.

Cheltenham.—The Sunday-school held their annual winter treat on Thursday, Jan. 19. Tea was followed by an entertainment, and a short address by the superintendent, the Rev. J. Fisher Jones.

The remainder of the evening was devoted to games.

Cirencester.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, held on the 22nd inst., the Committee's report stated that the debt of £83 14s. for repairs was nearly cleared off. Besides £5 towards the sum, contributed by the Committee, they had received the following donations:—Mr. F. Nettlefold, £10; Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., £3; Mr. Herbert Thomas, £2 2s.; Mr. Chas. Thomas, £1, leaving a balance due to the treasurer of £12 12s.

Colyton.—The annual scholars' party was held at the Assembly Room on week Wednesday. About 150 sat down to tea, and this number was considerably increased at the meeting after, when a programme of music and recitations was gone through by the children. There was also a Christmas Tree, filled with presents for the scholars. Thanks are due to many friends, and especially to Lady Bowring and other Exeter friends, and to Miss Powell (Aberystwyth).

Cullompton.—On Monday evening, Jan. 23, the Rev. T. B. Broadrick lectured in the schoolroom on "Life Lessons from Gladstone." At the close of the lecture a profitable discussion took place, and subsequently the annual business meeting of the congregation was held, Mr. Broadrick presiding, when the accounts of the past year were presented, showing a small balance in hand. Much sympathy was expressed at the resignation by Mr. H. H. Middle, on account of age and failing health, of his office as treasurer, held for thirty-one years, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed. Mr. S. T. Galpin was elected treasurer and Mr. H. J. Galpin, secretary. The meeting also wished to convey their deepest gratitude to the band of laymen and ladies who have so generously occupied the pulpit for the past year. The meeting closed with a short prayer by Mr. Broadrick.

Gloucester.—On Sunday morning a memorial window was dedicated to the memory of the late Mr. John Ashbee in Barton-street Chapel, Gloucester. The window is in four compartments. The subjects depicted in the upper ones are Faith and Hope, represented by two beaſtic figures gracefully draped, and having characteristic emblems set against a rich tapestry background of purples and greens. In the lower compartments of each light is a broad treatment of the fruitful vine, with a suitable inscription at the base. The window is erected by his widow to the memory of Mr. John Ashbee and his first wife, Mrs. Angelina Ashbee, and is from the studio of Messrs. Ashbee and Harvey, Birmingham, from designs furnished by and executed under the superintendence of Mr. Alfred J. Dunn, F.R.I.B.A., Gloucester.

Horsham.—A very pleasant conversation, arranged by the Union of Church Workers, was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday week. After a short speech of welcome from the Rev. J. J. Marten, music and recitations were given at intervals by a number of friends. Mr. Tarring, in proposing thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Marten for the efforts they had made to secure the success of the meeting, congratulated the congregation on the happiness of the connection which had now stood the test of seven years, and in their name wished most heartily to their minister and his family every blessing and good in the years to come. Mr. Marten, in responding, spoke of the happiness of their relations as minister and people, and expressed the hope that at the end of another seven years he might still meet them as their minister.

Hull.—The annual tea and entertainment to the elder folk was given at Park-street Church, under the auspices of the Workers' League, on Saturday, 21st inst. After the tea, at which about eighty guests were present, a varied entertainment, consisting of songs, violin solos, recitations, and readings, illustrated by means of a magic lantern, was given by members and friends of the congregation, not the least interesting feature in the programme being two stories told by Miss Marian Pritchard, of London, whom we were glad to see among us once more. On the Sunday following Miss Pritchard gave addresses to the younger and elder scholars of the Sunday-school, the latter consisting of an earnest appeal to those who were growing up among us to be faithful to the principles for which their fathers fought, and for which we, as a church, stand to-day.

Leeds: Hunslet.—At the close of the year the first half of a successful winter's work was completed. Socials and lectures have been well attended, and on the last day of the year the Sunday-school Christmas party was thoroughly enjoyed. On the 2nd inst. an excellent concert was given by Miss Thornton and friends, and on the 15th Mr. Briggs, of Mill Hill Chapel, and his choir, gave a musical service in the chapel, which was well attended and highly appreciated. On the 21st inst. the annual teachers' and parents' party was held, with a public meeting afterwards. Mr.

John Thornton presided, and gave a very cheery address; the other speakers were Messrs. Clayton, Hitchin, Taylor, Armistead, Prescott, A. Dobson, and the Rev. J. Fox. The prizes for attendance, thirty-five in number, were presented by Mr. Allen Nield. There is not much change to report in the school, but it is holding its ground and doing good work.

Leigh, Lancashire.—On Saturday last the teachers and elder scholars met in the schoolroom at the invitation of Mr. R. Ridyard, the superintendent. After tea the Rev. A. H. Dolphin took the chair, and explained the new arrangements which had to be made in consequence of the growth of the school. Mr. Ridyard then read a paper on "How to make Elder Scholars take more Interest in Sunday-school Work." The paper was followed by discussion and thanks to the reader and the host of the evening.

London: Clarence-road, Kentish Town.—The annual general meeting of the congregation of the Free Christian Church took place in the schoolroom on Monday evening, Jan. 23. The Rev. Alexander Farquharson occupied the chair, and in opening the proceedings, congratulated the meeting upon the satisfactory report, which, in spite of several adverse circumstances, the Committee were enabled to present. Up to this year during his ministry there had been a balance in hand, but owing to the great and personal loss of Mr. Hind, the most generous supporter, this was no longer the case. Also the diminution of the grant from the Unitarian Societies from £200 in 1894, to £50 in the past year, had been a marked factor in that result. Nevertheless, the substantial improvement which the possibility of such a reduction indicated, and an increase in the pew rents, would inspire the members with fresh hope and zeal in the advancement of their beautiful faith. And, further, the heavy expenses for repairs and drainage which had been met during the year by a special fund, to which many other friends had contributed, though at first a matter of grave anxiety, had indicated the kindness and sympathy of fellow-worshippers in other churches. All this he thought would stimulate every effort to make this a stronger and a better, a greater, and a nobler church. The committee's report and treasurer's account showing an adverse balance of £43, the reports and accounts of the Sunday-school, the Literary and Social Institute, the Ladies' Working Society which had contributed £35 to the church funds, the Band of Hope, Mothers' Meeting, and Hospital Cot Fund, were then read by the hon. secretary, and passed with the election of the Committee, and usual votes of thanks to the Unitarian Societies, the officers of the church, &c. The satisfactory and unanimous proceedings terminated with a hymn and benediction.

London: Deptford.—The Christmas and New Year's gatherings were successfully terminated on Tuesday last, when nearly 100 destitute persons, the majority of whom were upwards of sixty years of age, partook of a substantial dinner, which was followed by an enjoyable entertainment of music and ventriloquism. On Dec. 30, 400 destitute children were provided with a good breakfast, and on Jan. 16 the Rev. A. J. and Mrs. Marchant held an "at home" in the chapel to the members of the congregation.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The third United Teachers' Meeting of the Session was held in the Lower Mosley-street, schoolroom on Sunday, January 22, the President (Mr. H. Woodhead) in the chair. The Rev. W. R. Shanks read a paper entitled "Books that would help Teachers," and said that probably no other group of Sunday-schools in the world are so well supplied with books as our own, nor was the quality less excellent than the number, and that our teachers had need to be grateful for the enterprise and forethought of our central authorities. There was, however, need for a fresh popular commentary on the Gospels, which should be brief, rationalistic, and as far as possible written from the point of view of Jesus himself. Another book much needed was a Lectionary of the Scriptures, a selection of the best of the narratives and of the loftiest of the Inspirational passages of the Bible. A manual for superintendents on Sunday-school management, would also be useful. A discussion followed in which the following ladies and gentlemen took part:—Miss Solomonson, Miss Wanham, Messrs. Woodhead, Robinson, D. A. Little, Pimley, Hyde and White.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—Mr. Romesh Dutt, C.I.E., spoke at the popular service on Sunday evening last. His subject was "British Rule in India." British rule had, he said, secured, among other things, two important blessings to India—namely, peace, which had not been interrupted within the frontiers of India within the last forty years, and a system of Western education which had brought India closer to Europe and to modern civilisation. But, he regretted to add, peace had not brought with it plenty; and Western education had not yet led to the establishment of Western methods of representative self-government. As to the exclusiveness of British rule, it tended to grow worse rather than better. Liberty of the Press had been withdrawn in India after sixty years' enjoyment of it, and now an attempt was being made to destroy the representative character of the Calcutta municipality, after twenty years' excellent work by the native Commissioners. He hoped that these retrograde steps were only part of the temporary wave of reaction now passing over England, and that with the passing away of that condition in England would come a great extension in India of those principles of self-government which had strengthened and consolidated the Empire everywhere else. A fresh series of popular lantern lectures was commenced on Monday last, and they will be continued on consecutive Monday evenings until the end of March. They will deal with holidays and travels at home and abroad. Dr. R. W. Marsden was the lecturer last Monday, and he gave an interesting account of the legends and scenery of the Rhine. Next Monday Mr. Dugdale will lecture on "Ten Years in Lower Egypt."

Nantwich.—On Wednesday, the 18th inst., the annual Sunday-school concert and prize distribution took place. An excellent programme was provided, in which upwards of fifty scholars took part. The Superintendent (the Rev. J. M. Mill-) distributed prizes to thirty-six scholars for good conduct and punctuality. On Wednesday, the 25th, the scholars' winter treat was held.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The quarterly meeting of the union was held at Gorton on Saturday last. About 110 persons were present. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. W. Harrison, the president, supported by Mr. T. Barrow, vice-president, and Mr. A. Slater, hon. secretary. Mr. James Clayton read an interesting paper entitled "Sunday-schools: Are they played out?" and a good discussion followed, taken part in by the Revs. N. Green, H. E. Dowson, B.A., W. C. Hall, M.A., J. A. Pearson, Miss Dornan, and Messrs. J. Wild, T. Ashton, E. B. Broadrick and J. Barrow. Votes of thanks to the essayists and to the Gorton friends for their hospitality and entertainment (which included several interesting songs by the children) were heartily accorded, and Mr. Clayton and the Rev. G. Evans, M.A., suitably responded. The Evening Hymn and Benediction brought a most successful meeting to a close.

Stalybridge.—The annual business meeting was held on Sunday week at the close of evening service, Mr. James Jackson, the chapel warden, in the chair. The secretary, Mr. James Oliver, read the annual report. It spoke of the church and all those connected being in a healthy condition, though there was room for improvement in the attendance at morning service. The number of members was the same as last year, notwithstanding a loss of thirty-seven by death, removals, and other causes. The two upper classes in the Sunday-school, about thirty young men and thirty young women, continued members of the church. Nearly all the teachers in the school were members. The report reminded the congregation that the Rev. W. Harrison had completed ten years' ministry among them, the longest ministry in connection with their church, and the Committee felt that they were expressing the feeling of the whole congregation in congratulating him on the fact, and wishing him health and strength to carry on his labours among them.

Todmorden.—On Sunday, Jan. 22, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached here, both morning and evening, to large congregations, who greatly appreciated his inspiring discourses. Collections taken on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association amounted to over £15.

Walsley.—Last Saturday the needlework class held a sale of articles worked by the members this winter. The sale was opened by Mr. Henry Harwood, of Rivington. Afterwards tea was served to 160 persons, and an entertainment of songs and recitations given by teachers and scholars. The class had set themselves to raise £5 towards paying for the new American organ. This sum, however, was more than doubled, for, with donations from a few friends, there was a clear profit of £12.

West Bromwich.—An exceedingly interesting and unique service was held last Sunday evening in this town. Some little time ago the superintendent of our Sunday-school (Mr. W. S. Watts) was appointed Chairman of the Hospital Sunday Scholars' Committee, and in response to certain representations made by him, a meeting of ministers and superintendents representing every Sunday-school in West Bromwich, Wednesbury, and Oldbury, was convened by the Mayor to suggest means of creating a greater interest in the children's ward of the hospital, and of augmenting the funds of the institution. At the meeting it was determined among other things to hold a public united service in the Town Hall. That service was held on Sunday evening, the Mayor (Councillor Pitt) presiding over an immense audience in the large Town Hall. A choir of children from the various Sunday-schools had been trained for the occasion and rendered suitable hymns during the meeting, and addresses were given by various local ministers. The meeting was opened with a hymn followed by a prayer and Scripture reading. The Chairman then read a letter written by our superintendent, which originated what he (the Chairman) considered was a very good movement. The Rev. F. A. Homer then addressed the meeting. Basing his address on the words "Be ye all like-minded," 1 Peter iii. 8, he argued that the Apostle in these words asked not for uniformity of opinion, but for unity of aim, unity of affection, and unity of spirit. Having spoken of our duty to be compassionate, to be tender-hearted, and to love as brethren, he lamented the bitterness, the anger, the railing, the cruelty, the persecution, and the murders which had been perpetrated by Christians upon Christians, because of a false idea of unity, because of confounding uniformity of opinion with the unity of the spirit. Men had persisted in the idea that to be a Christian was to hold certain doctrines and opinions, creed had been placed above character, and an artificial uniformity of belief usurped the place of the true Christian unity of affection, aspiration, and endeavour. "Shall we of West Bromwich, at least," he continued, "set an example to the world by our earnest desire to work together to promote the kingdom of God on earth?" He pleaded for open minds ready to receive new light from God, and urged that not in creeds, articles of faith, or catechisms shall we find our true unity, but rather in such acts as that in which they were that night engaged, when creed and sect sank into the background, and they united in worshipping the common Father and honouring the common Lord and Master, and that, too, not only in word, not only with the voice of prayer, and praise, and thanksgiving, but by helping forward to the best of their ability the cause of suffering humanity. The Rev. R. B. Robson, vicar of Golds Hill, a subsequent speaker, spoke of the great value of the work of the hospital, and remarked with satisfaction upon the fact that this was a work in which they could all agree. It was in connection with causes like this that they had the subject of the great Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood of man brought prominently forward, and they learnt how they could help each other. This institution was calculated to banish and uproot bigotry and intolerance, and to help them to realise that unity of aim to which the previous speaker had referred. Other addresses were delivered, and at the close a collection was taken, the total result of which, including a donation sent with one of the letters of apology, was £14.

York.—The Rev. Dennis Hird, M.A., formerly rector of Eistnor, has accepted a lectureship at the new Ruskin Hall, Oxford. Mr. Hird, who is at present preaching at St. Savourgate, will conclude his temporary engagement there on Feb. 5.

ETHICAL RELIGION.

for Theists.*

A Compilation of Selected Passages Freely
Arranged without Note or Comment.

street. Price One Shilling.

If it is "the Personal Religion of Jesus" that we would learn; what He actually taught, and what His real Life meant—not what other men believed or declared of Him after His departure—this "reasonable quest of sacred truth" must be directed to that portion of the books in our possession, which can be relied upon as an historical record. Original written documents, fairly well attested, were available in the Apostolic age. These were, first, the reports of public discourses, heard and noted down by Matthew, who would, from the nature of his secular business, be able to write in his native language, though Peter and John, the fishermen, were at that time illiterate men; and secondly, the collection of biographical data gathered by Mark, when he served the Apostolic missions as secretary, from his conversations with men who had accompanied Jesus in Galilee. To these materials we may safely add the parables, likely to have been preserved by frequent oral repetition at Christian meetings; and a few obviously characteristic personal anecdotes.

A serious attempt, a merely tentative essay, is here ventured, to show that such probably genuine elements of the books called "the First Three" or "Synoptic Gospels"—which books, in their present form, cannot be proved to have existed before the middle, at any rate, of the Second Century—may be separated from whatever additions or interpolations should appear due to anonymous, irresponsible, literary compilers, in those composite, amplified narratives, our "Scriptures," which were subsequently adopted by the ecclesiastical canon. It will not be deemed a reprehensible intrusion. It is now submitted, but with some diffidence, only as an experiment, in the hope that more competent scholars will soon undertake this needful task. The following rules for determining the unauthenticity of passages abounding in the "Three First Gospels" are laid down by the Rev. Dr. Martineau in "The Seat of Authority in Religion" (Edition of 1890, pages 577, 593, 596, 652):—

"THE VEIL TAKEN AWAY."

"1. Wherever, during or before the ministry of Jesus, any person in the narrative is made to speak in language, or refer to events, which had their origin at a later date, the report is incredible as an anachronism.

"2. Miraculous events cannot be regarded as adequately attested, in presence of natural causes accounting for belief in their occurrence.

"3. Acts and words ascribed to Jesus, which plainly transcend the moral level of the narrators, authenticate themselves as his; while such as are out of character with his spirit, but congruous with theirs, must be referred to inaccurate tradition.

"The first of these rules compels us to treat as unauthentic, in its present form, every reputed or implied claim of Jesus to be the promised Messiah.

"While it is impossible to reach any original attestation, which we can appreciate as adequate, to substantiate the tales that would be incredible to-day, nothing is more certain than that, in the state of mind out of which the Church was born, miracles would have been freely believed, whether they had really happened or not."—(Page 593.)

"The application of our third rule, excluding what is incongruous with the personal characteristics of Jesus, is a much more difficult and delicate task for the critic than he encounters with the other two; nor will his handling of it, however cautious, bring conviction to those who require more definite grounds of belief than those afforded by harmony and disharmony in the shades of character. And yet, to those who cannot help being affected by such phenomena, there is nothing more persuasive."—(Page 596.)

"THE RELIGION PERSONALLY REALISED."

"If Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God."—(Page 652.)

THE LIFE OF HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.,

Professor of English at University College, London.

BY

HENRY SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD. 1898. Price 12s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Speaker.—"Professor Morley, the author and lecturer, would be in any case a person worth reading about. Henry Morley, the man, large in heart and brain, is, perhaps, still more worthy of our attention. . . . Mr. Solly's 'Life' ought to be bought by public libraries, presented by rich men to ministers of religion, and read by all who love English morals and English literature."

The Athenæum.—"Henry Morley's life was busy and full of interest. . . . amazingly successful if tested by the true tests of success. Morley won a unique position among the scholars and teachers of our day."

The Academy.—"Mr. Solly . . . lets his subject speak for himself, in letter or diary, where these are available; but he has devoted thought to the selection of his material and the arrangement of it was to present a real portrait."

The Scotsman.—"A well-filled volume of some 400 pages . . . it will at once be welcomed among books of its class . . . to those who would know the real worth of the man, much as he was known to his family, a reading of this excellent biography is indispensable."

Daily Chronicle.—"Not one man in a thousand would have won his way upward from such a quagmire of early troubles. . . . Mr. Solly has done his work well. This biography of his father-in-law is admirably written, in good taste, and with plenty of relief."

Daily Mail.—"An entirely satisfactory and eminently readable biography of a most lovable personality."

Manchester Guardian.—"There is always something fascinating to the student of human nature in the biography of a man who has in him the true instinct of the fighter, who begins life with tremendous odds against him, proceeds straightway to gird his loins for the fray, and after years of conflict emerges victorious. Henry Morley was essentially such a man."

Standard.—"The 'Life of Henry Morley' . . . has an interest of its own."

The Liverpool Post.—"Very well written."

Inquirer.—"This story of his life is sure of a most cordial welcome."

The Literary World.—"Mr. Solly has done his work well, and puts before us a strong and vivid portrait of a man of marked character, of considerable genius, and, above all, of indomitable pluck and perseverance. The story of Morley's struggles to make an income, and to break down the family opposition to his marriage with the woman of his choice, is reading of a very heartening sort."

Birmingham Post.—"The latter part of this biography, recording Professor Morley's work as a man of letters, is the more important; the former, detailing his fight with circumstances, is the more fascinating."

The Leeds Mercury.—"An admirable full-length portrait of a good man."

The Westminster Gazette.—"His life was well worth writing. . . . The personality revealed by his biographer is a singularly attractive one—generous, full of humour, the very soul of honour, 'a teacher of truth, of righteousness, and of love.' Mr. Solly shows admirable taste and discretion throughout his book."

Publishers' Circular.—"Among the countless students who have felt the influence of his teaching as lecturer and professor, the work is certain of a cordial welcome."

Isle of Wight County Press.—"To Mr. Solly nothing but the highest praise can be accorded for the manner in which he has accomplished his work; neither author nor editor, he has struck the happiest medium, and given us a volume which charms from its earliest pages, and in which the characters live and move before us right on to the end of the chapter."

Independent.—"Shows us how this well-equipped, self-sacrificing, and influential teacher was himself taught. Henry Morley won his wisdom by hard and bitter toil. The story of his life, as now set forth, is as interesting as were his methods of instruction; it will appeal to all whose happy privilege it was to be brought into direct contact with him, and to all who became acquainted with his work through the medium of the printed pages."

Daily News.—"Few memoirs more interesting have made their appearance in recent times."

Third Edition. Revised. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

PSALMS OF THE WEST.

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.
"We have in this volume ninety Psalms of modern times containing innumerable beautiful sentiments."—Christian Life.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

At the annual meeting of the Sustentation Fund, a report of which will be found in another column, a letter was read from the Rev. Robert Spears entering a protest against a grant made by the managers of the Fund to a congregation the minister of which had declared himself to stand "outside the Christian Church." The meeting was not largely attended, but it affirmed with complete unanimity that no wrong had been done either to the letter or the spirit of the constitution of the Fund, which is determined by the constitution of the National Conference. No one has had from the first a more intimate knowledge of the working of the Fund and of the principles on which it was founded than Mr. Rawson, and he moved the resolution in reply to the protest. It was seconded by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and when it is remembered that it had the concurrence of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, and such representative laymen as Mr. William Long, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. J. T. Preston, Mr. Cogan Conway, and Mr. Grosvenor Lee, as well as the other officers of the Fund, we do not think that many of our readers will agree with Mr. Spears that "a great moral wrong" has been done to our common cause.

We regret very much that this question should have been raised, or that there should be any such question in the minds of any of our people; but it is a satisfaction in this instance to have the issue clearly stated, and not to be met with vague and anonymous charges as to the character of the teaching of certain of our ministers or the tendency of religious life in our midst. Such charges cannot fail to leave false impressions on the mind of the public, and are only mischievous in their result. The issue raised by Mr. Spears is, as a matter of fact, whether in our National Conference, being by inheritance and by actual faith a body of Christians worshipping in Free Churches, we shall establish a test of Christian profession and attempt to exclude all those who are unwilling or unable to make that profession. The managers of the Sustentation Fund declare that they must be faithful to the undogmatic principle which is the basis of the Conference, and so long as applications are received from congregations included in the Conference, duly assembling for the public worship of God, they can institute no inquisition into the doctrinal beliefs of the minister. In this we hold that they are perfectly right, and we would add, and would urge it very strongly on any of our friends who may be troubled over this question, that the cause of Christian truth and discipleship will not be strengthened but only injured by the attempt to establish any such test of membership. We must not shrink from the dangers and duties of our spiritual freedom, and we must have more faith in the power of Christian grace and truth. If any earnest minister of God holds views from which we dissent, we must not attempt to cut off supplies, or shut him out from religious fellowship, but it must be a call to us to be ourselves better Christians, to manifest in our word and life what we feel to be the better truth. That is the true surrender to God in the freedom of the spirit, and the way by which He will lead us into a better future.

THE British Friend, writing of the new Free Church Catechism, welcomes its testimony to the noteworthy change in the attitude of the Protestant denominations to one another, in that Baptist Calvinists and Methodist Arminians can now agree on a formula of belief in regard to the vexed question of free will and grace; but adds that in itself the document can have little interest for Friends:—

Its theology, though showing many signs of the progress of religious thought, abounds in "safe" statements, which may mean much or little, and manifests compromise rather than firm intellectual grip. From our point of view the Catechism "gives itself away" on the subject of the Sacraments, taking a line which, we are confident, historical study will prove to be untenable. Our friend J. Rendel Harris was originally on the Committee, but was compelled to resign his position from lack of leisure. No Friend, therefore, is responsible for the document, and we think it is better so.

BOTH the New York Tribune and the Christian Register welcome a proposal which has been made to hold a religious conference for the State of New York. A circular letter has been issued calling for the organisation of such conferences in all the States. For this especial meeting the intention is to hold biennial meetings under the auspices of all the religious bodies of the State. Among the signers to the circular letter are Drs. Leighton Williams, Baptist; Henry A. Stimson, Congregationalist; G. Gottheil, Jewish; F. M. North, Methodist; Charles Cuthbert Hall, Presbyterian; R. Heber Newton, Episcopal; Joachim Elmendorf, Reformed; Robert Collyer, Unitarian; C. H. Eaton, Universalist. The temporary secretary of the committee is the Rev. William C. Gannett. The conference is to meet, not for legislation or propagandism, but to take counsel concerning the interests the churches have in common and the work that belongs to them all together. The members will meet freely, organise for the purposes of the meeting, transact their business, and then go each to his own work, filled with a new spirit of brotherhood. Such is the proposal described in the Register.

A VOLUME of sermons by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, translated into German, under the title "Faith and Science," has been published by Messrs. Vandenhoeck and Rupprecht, of Göttingen. From a review in Der Protestant, a liberal Evangelical paper published in Berlin, we learn that the translation is by the same hand as formerly translated Robertson's sermons. Mr. Brooke, the reviewer says, is already well known in Germany as Robertson's biographer, and his sermons are cordially welcomed as a refreshing change from the ordinary preaching in the Church. After describing with warm appreciation the main lines of Mr. Brooke's teaching, the review adds an appeal to religious liberals to prove by the more earnest spirit of their life, both in devotion and in work, that God is with them, and concludes with a prayer that the Church may be blessed by the union of freedom and piety, unfettered thought and inspired faith.

LAST Sunday was the four-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Katharina von Bora, who in 1525 became Luther's wife. Fifteen years younger than the great reformer, she survived him for nearly seven years, in troubled times, which brought her suffering and privation, and died in December, 1552. When Luther first broke away from the authority of Rome, he vigorously attacked, among other abuses, the evils of the celibacy of the clergy and of monastic life, he encouraged his friends to make homes for themselves, and rejoiced in their new happiness, but for himself he had no thought of marriage. It was more than four years after his burning of the Pope's Bull that he suddenly determined that he also ought to marry, and chose Katharina for his wife, who two years earlier had escaped with others from a convent, and had found a refuge in Wittenberg. She was a sensible and very capable woman, whose influence over her husband was all for good, and the source of the greatest happiness to him for twenty years. "Next to God's Word," he said, "the world has no more precious treasure than holy matrimony. God's best gift is a pious, cheerful, God-fearing, home-keeping wife, with whom you may live peacefully, to whom you can entrust your goods, and body, and life." And in his Table Talk he says of Katharina: "I am, thank God, very well, for I have a pious, faithful wife, on whom a man may safely rest his heart."

A TABLET to the memory of Toplady, author of the hymn "Rock of Ages, cleft for me," has been placed in the Parish Church of Broadhembury, Devon, where he was vicar at the time of the first publication of his hymns, and before his removal to a Calvinistic church in London. The tablet is in white marble, and is an upright oblong, except for a medallion portrait which breaks the line of the upper edge. The inscription is surrounded by a border of foliage beautifully carved, and the white marble stands out in relief against a darker background. The tablet is inscribed:—

In grateful memory of the Rev. Augustus Montague Toplady, B.A., vicar of this parish from 1768 to 1778, and author of the immortal hymn, "Rock of Ages" (quoting the whole of the first verse) to whose personal piety, brilliant gifts, sanctified learning, and uncompromising advocacy of the Gospel of the Sovereign Grace of God, his writings bear abundant testimony. This tablet is erected A.D. 1898, being 120 years after he entered into the joy of his Lord on the 11th August, 1778, in the 38th year of his age. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: not of works, lest any man should boast."—Eph. ii. 8, 9.

THE Albert Hall was filled last Tuesday by 10,000 determined Protestants, who met, under the presidency of Lord Kinnaid, "to uphold and maintain the Protestantism of the nation, and to demand the suppression of the Mass and the Confessional in the Established Church." The Bishops of Liverpool and of Sodor and Man sent messages of sympathy. It was agreed, with only one or two dissentients, to send a telegram to the Queen, asking her gracious acceptance of a copy of Walsh's "Secret History of the Oxford Movement," and begging her to see that steps are taken to suppress Romish practices in the Church, and to compel the Bishops to enforce obedience to the law. The trustees of the hall had made a condition that Mr. Kensit should not be allowed to speak; but he got in a word or two to explain this, and to say that his speech would appear in the official report.

THE Royal Arsenal Co-operative Society at Woolwich, which lately bought 52 acres of agricultural land in order to supply its members with fresh farm produce, has now secured an estate of 122 acres at the cost of over £40,000, in order to erect cottages for its members that shall be comfortable and convenient, and of the best materials and workmanship. These dwellings are to be built by their own Works Department; and, we are glad to know, that the freehold is to remain the common property of all the members of the society, so that the houses shall never fall into the hands of private landlords, large or small, who might let them degenerate into crowded slums.

At a recent lecture on "Lead Poisoning in the Potteries," delivered by Miss Mayo in the Lecture Hall of the Brighton Free Christian Church, and presided over by Mrs. Hood, the following resolution was passed unanimously:—"That this meeting of the Brighton branch of the Women's Co-operative Guild expresses its strong desire and sincere hope that in the pottery about to be reconstructed the Co-operative Wholesale Society will see that the use of raw lead is entirely prohibited." And, in answer to this resolution, Mrs. Hood has received the following:—

To Mrs. A. E. Hood, 29, Round Hill-crescent, Brighton.

DEAR MADAM,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 21st inst., and must thank you for sending me a copy of the resolution passed at your meeting on the 17th inst. I will lay your communication before my Board at their next meeting. In the meantime I might say that we have for some time past been making experiments in connection with the question of leadless glazes, and we hope to bring them to a successful issue. It may be of interest to your society to know that during the last thirty years there has not been a single case of lead poisoning at the Brownfield's Pottery. —Yours faithfully, H. POOLE, Secretary.

Our readers will be glad to know that Minton has lately produced some pottery with leadless glaze.

REPORTING the recent discovery of what the antiquaries of Rome regard as the great black stone under which it was intended to bury Romulus, the Spectator draws a moral as to the "blundering" of destructive criticism. The find was made in the course of some excavations at the east end of the Forum, and it is taken to be the veritable stone which for ages was regarded as the palladium and centre of Rome. "Of its existence there is no doubt, and no invader would have thought it worth while to take it away. The discovery, like almost all discoveries of recent years in Italy, as well as Egypt, helps to prove that destructive criticism is blundering criticism, and that the legends of history usually rest upon some solid basis. . . . The deliberate invention of a figure like Romulus is much more improbable than his existence." The stone, no doubt, is solid enough, and may have been there from time immemorial, even before the foundation of the city. If it is the stone of the legend, what is proved, we should say, is that the legend of Romulus came to be connected with it—and the question as to how much history there may be in Romulus remains exactly where it was before. "Deliberate invention" and "existence" hardly exhaust the possibilities in the growth of legend.

THE Rev. Herbert Mott, writing in the Christian Register, pleads that it is not creeds which have hindered the union of Christendom, but rather the narrowness and inadequacy of those which have been adopted; and he suggests that on the following lines there might be formulated "a conquering creed," which would be a real strength and bond of union:—

"We believe it is required of all men to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God, and that, except these requirements be fulfilled, we can in no wise obtain happiness or be delivered from evil.

"Nevertheless, it is impossible to fulfil these requirements of our own strength alone.

"We believe that in the teachings of Jesus Christ are revealed most clearly the means by which the needed strength and help may be obtained.

"We believe the sum and substance of those teachings to be: the reality, righteousness, and Fatherhood of God; the privilege of man to draw power from God through prayer; the imperative duty of love to God and man.

"We believe that the religion of Jesus, thus interpreted, contains everything needful to salvation; for, if we are thoroughly convinced of the reality, righteousness, and Fatherhood of God, and if we believe it to be His will that we should love Him and our fellow-men, and if we use diligently the privilege of prayer, then we shall do justly and love mercy and walk humbly with God, and in the doing of these things, and not otherwise, we shall be set free, finally, from all manner of evil whatsoever, and shall be born again, and find peace and the assurance of eternal life.

"We believe the religion of Jesus, thus interpreted, to be the only form of Christianity competent to deliver men from evil, inasmuch as it alone is able to support its claim to authority and truth with the full weight of reason; and, therefore, it alone can influence men powerfully enough to enable them to overcome temptation and surmount misfortune."

THE Congregational body and Non-conformists generally have suffered a grievous loss in the death of Dr. Charles Berry, of Wolverhampton, in his forty-seventh year. Dr. Berry had suffered from frequent attacks of angina pectoris, and on Tuesday had delivered an address at the funeral of his friend and physician, Dr. Totherick, and was in the act of prayer when he suddenly expired. For some years the strain of overwork had told severely upon Dr. Berry, and he had borne heroically the consequent sufferings from which he is now released. A native of Leigh, in Lancashire, his boyhood was spent at Southport, and he was educated for the ministry at Airedale College. His first ministerial charge was at Bolton, and in 1883 he removed to Wolverhampton, where he at once made his power felt, both in the church and in the town. On the death of Henry Ward Beecher, he was invited to Plymouth Church, but elected to remain with his own people. He was the first president of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, and in 1897 was chairman of the Congregational Union. In 1895 the honorary degree of D.D. had been conferred upon him by St. Andrew's University.

EVERY human being is intended to have a character of his own—to be what no other is, to do what no other can do.—Channing.

LITERATURE.

ST. THOMAS OF CANTERBURY.*

DR. ABBOTT has in this book produced a valuable and suggestive piece of work, though we can hardly agree with him that it is very fertile in the special interest which he indicates in his Preface. He writes, not so much as a student of mediæval saint-lore, as from a strong interest in the value of testimony and the bearing of a careful study of historical evidence in another field upon Gospel criticism. The book is divided into two main sections. The first deals with the martyrdom of Thomas à Becket. The different accounts, which are to be found in the "Materials for the History of Thomas Becket" in the Rolls Series, have been extracted, translated and arranged with notes, so as to exhibit in a very clear way the agreements and discrepancies between the several narrators. The second and longer section comprises a careful study of the Miracles. The purpose of the whole is expressed in the following words:—"The author is not without hope that it may be of some indirect service to theologians of all schools, in so far as all are, or ought to be, students of evidence. One reason why the criticism of the Gospels oscillates much, and progresses little, is that there has been little systematic study of other similar documents such as may be called Synoptic (like our first three Gospels), or Supplementary (like our fourth). On this subject, a vast superfluity of opinions coexists with a paucity of arranged materials for forming opinions, and with an almost complete absence of recognised rules of criticism. The object of this treatise, so far as it bears on theology, is to supply a store of classified facts that no reasonable critic can afford to despise."

We confess that these words and Dr. Abbott's great eminence as a critic raised sanguine hopes in our minds. But these hopes have not been altogether fulfilled. In the first place we are struck far more by the dissimilarity in nearly all the circumstances than by the parallelism between the Gospels and the Becket narratives. In the latter there is no question at all of a synoptic document or tradition. Five of the writers claim to be eye-witnesses and write in their own words. Dr. Abbott gives some appearance of parallelism by comparing the later fourfold life, known as the Quadrilogus to Tatian's Diatessaron; but here again the difference is more striking than the similarity. John of Salisbury, Benedict and Alan have no such relation as that existing between our canonical Matthew, Mark and Luke; and it would be difficult to say anything in favour of the comparison of Herbert of Bosham to the author of our Fourth Gospel. This is the concluding sentence of Dr. Abbott's own description of him: "His narrative of facts, his comments on his own narrative, his defences of his own prolixity, carry prolixity to its height." Herbert was undoubtedly a personal friend of the Archbishop, and must have drawn largely upon his own reminiscences. Does Dr. Abbott mean to imply his conversion to the traditional belief that the fourth evangelist did the same because he was a personal friend of our Lord? We may, perhaps, refer to one interesting point of comparison which seems to have been overlooked. There is a curious similarity between the use of the language of the Old Testament by the evangelists and that of the Vulgate by the Becket narrators. In both cases they were simply using the religious vernacular of their day, probably without any conscious intention of shaping the facts to suit the words of Scripture. On the whole the one significant impression, which these documents have left upon our mind, is that of the futility of historical scepticism. All that it concerns us to know about Becket's death is quite clear. Slight discrepancies in small details do nothing to destroy, they hardly even blur the lines of a great historical picture. If, indirectly, Dr. Abbott's study of the narratives impresses some of our New Testament critics with the danger of overlooking the substantial historical accuracy of the Gospels, while they spend their time in magnifying the significance of small differences of detail, he will have rendered us no little service.

The second and much longer section of the book, dealing with the miracles of St. Thomas, is in many ways the more interesting. Again, we are bound to confess that the parallelism with the Gospels is very slight. These mediæval miracles are for the most part lacking in the simplicity which gives such a touch of nature to many of the Gospel miracles. They are more grotesque, more magical. But still more striking is the fact that they are worked not by the word or touch of the living person, but by the influence of relics or of pious memory. If any comparison is to be made with the New Testament it must be with the miracles recorded in the Book of Acts as done in the name of Christ. But putting this purpose on one side, we recognise at once that Dr. Abbott has given us a most valuable study in hagiology. Of none of the saints of the Middle Ages have we such full and detailed information as in the case of Thomas à Becket, with the possible exception of St. Francis of Assisi. With the latter, however, the whole interest is concentrated upon the life and the simple human goodness of the Poverello. With Thomas the sainthood first emerges when the militant archbishop has been baptised in the blood of martyrdom; and he shows his power not by winning disciples, but by working miracles with his relics and at his shrine. The account of these miracles is contained in the two contemporary narratives of the monks Benedict and William. That a great deal of what they tell us is substantially true, hardly admits of doubt. These are no floating popular traditions of miracle, but cases, mainly of healing, authenticated at the time, due to drinking the "water of St. Thomas"—i.e., water with a supposed infusion of the blood of the martyr. With these are, of course, to be found a number of stories far less credible, many of them absurd and grotesque, like that of the gander, which was restored to life when it was dedicated to St. Thomas: "Witnessis," says William, "the martyr's tomb to which that gander was brought! Witnesses are my respectable brethren by whom that gander was welcomed and eaten!" One of the most interesting narratives from the point of view of the psychology of faith-healing is that of a young man who, at the point of death, asked his friends for the Martyr's Water. None was to be had: "But," says the chronicler, "one of them ran to a spring, and fetched a vessel of fresh water, saying, 'Here is the Water of the Saint which you desire.' The sick man believed and drank, and under this health-giving deception was immediately cured. For at once, abandoned by the disease, he left his bed, feeling nothing amiss except mere weakness. This same young man not only related these facts to us, but also brought to Canterbury the person who drew the water from the fountain and other witnesses."

This great collection of miracles has a twofold value. It helps those, who will read with care, to enter into the religious life of the Middle Ages among the uneducated and the poor, to feel the atmosphere of its popular faith. We have been reminded again and again of Lourdes with its crowds of pilgrims, its bureau for authenticating miracles, and its official organ for making them public. The similarity of feeling produced by the perusal of these bygone records and a visit to the modern shrine is almost startling. There is the same atmosphere of a different and less real world, the same eager belief on the part of the sick and the poor in supernatural aid.

Secondly, Dr. Abbott's account of the miracles of St. Thomas has an important bearing on the whole study of the miraculous, and the notes which he has appended are often suggestive in the highest degree. In the last chapter of his book he draws some inferences, which we will venture to summarise. (1) "In the two Books of St. Thomas's Miracles, few or none of the early miracles, and in the Gospels none at all, can be explained by imposture." (2) "In both cases, a clear distinction must be drawn between (a) miracles wrought on human nature, which are substantially to be accepted, and (b) miracles wrought on non-human nature—e.g., bread, wine, water, trees, swine, birds, &c. The latter are not to be accepted as historical, but as legends explicable from poetry taken as prose (i.e., from metaphor regarded as literal), or from linguistic error, or from these two causes combined." (3) "The power of healing disease through the emotions extends not only to the paralysed, the deaf, dumb, and lame, but to the blind also, and to those afflicted with skin disease." (4) "Death is sometimes preceded by several hours of apparent lifelessness. . . . During this period, re-animation may follow from the passionate appeal of a nurse, father or mother, if uttered under a strong faith in a power that will raise up the [person alleged to be] dead." (5) "Two or three accounts of the restoration by St. Thomas of members that had been extracted or cut off are so extraordinary and well-attested that they deserve the attention of experts." (6) "The power of working extraordinary acts of faith-healing does not necessarily imply the far higher power of inspiring concord and mutual affection binding a community into one."

Whether these inferences will win anything like general assent may well be doubted. To some they will appear to admit too little, to others to claim too much. But no one can deny that they are piquant and interesting, and are likely to provoke thought.

As we have said above, we believe that Dr. Abbott has over-estimated the value of his work in certain directions, but we recognise to the full the great learning and acuteness of mind it displays. We have wandered with him with delight into the fascinating field of mediæval lore; and if he is a little too anxious to find side-lights upon his own special study, where the facts hardly warrant it, this perhaps only enhances the eagerness with which we look forward to the appearance of the Commentary on the Four Gospels, of which he speaks in his Preface. It cannot fail to be brilliant and original, with an individual note of its own.

* "St. Thomas of Canterbury: His Death and Miracles." By Edwin A. Abbott, M.A., D.D. Adam and Charles Black, 2 vols, 24s.

A TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

SIR,—Your request for expressions of opinion upon the above subject has drawn forth two letters of approval from Mr. Robinson and Mr. Harrison respectively. With your permission, I should like to offer some reasons against the proposal. Perhaps I am alone in disliking it; but in any case the statement of such reasons will tend to the clearer understanding of the subject.

If there were already before our churches some definite scheme or undertaking upon which we were and for some time had been thoroughly agreed, and which only needed money to carry it out, then it would be natural enough to organise a great fund for the purpose. This was done in the case of Manchester College, when a new home had to be built for it in Oxford. But there is no such generally adopted and recognised scheme before our churches now for which a large fund is required. Mr. Robinson suggests, as a suitable object, a large increase to the two funds in aid of ministers' stipends. Mr. Harrison will leave the choice of an object to a representative Committee. I would ask, Sir, Is money so plentiful amongst us that we can calmly set out to raise £200,000, not knowing what we are going to do with it when we have got it? And I would further ask, would this suggestion of a Twentieth Century Fund have been made if our Wesleyan friends had not started one? It does not follow that what is wise for them is wise for us. And I can only see in the proposal before us a desire for rivalry, hampered by the want of a respectable pretext.

Further, it should be considered that the proposed fund, if established, will certainly injure local funds and institutions by draining off and drying-up many of their sources of income. Can we afford to cripple our regular and necessary work in order to raise a great sum for an unknown object?

The London Bazaar has been referred to. It seems to me not fair towards the organisers of that bazaar to spring this proposed fund upon our people now. London helped Manchester royally in 1897; and it is to be hoped that Manchester is preparing to make to London a suitable return. Can either the London congregations, or those in Manchester, or those in other districts, which will probably wish to help London, do anything substantial if they are all to subscribe to this fund? I doubt it very much, and I do not think they ought to be asked.

Then, Sir, if we are to have a huge fund, ought not the suggestion to come from those upon whom the heaviest burden will fall? It is all very well for those of us who might give a guinea or two to say, "Let us raise £200,000." That amount will not be raised without very large donations from our rich laymen. And if I was a rich layman I should resent being expected to subscribe heavily to a fund for which there was no apparent necessity, and which had been started by those who would not feel half the strain of it.

I entirely dissent from the opinion of Mr. Harrison, that "the raising of such a fund would do immense good to our Free Churches at present, while the spending of it would produce untold blessings in the future." Our churches have already got plenty of work to do that does not need a single fund of £200,000 to do it; and there are plenty of objects upon which they can unite if they will. "If such a fund is raised" (I adapt Mr. Harrison's peroration), "I know one minister," who will not give a guinea nor even a sixpence, either this year or any other year, but will entirely decline to contribute to it. What I might be able to give I will send to the London Bazaar.

THE FREE CHURCH CATECHISM.

SIR,—The remarks of your contributors who gave us their views of the new Free Church Catechism were all interesting; but it is doubtful whether the various writers took the matter sufficiently to heart—or, perhaps, they did not want to seem unkind. But we can be frank without being offensive, and it appears to me that men like Dr. Clifford and Dr. Horton want dealing with very frankly indeed.

Dr. Clifford tells the world that this tiny Catechism took two years to prepare. He also tells us that every question and every answer got settled without a dissentient vote. And it took two years! and yet there is positively nothing fresh and modern in it. Elsewhere, Dr. Clifford tells us that the Catechism is as remarkable for what it leaves out as for what it puts in. This is highly interesting. The process must have been a process of paring down, of compromise, of getting at something sufficiently vague to mean anything, or sufficiently conventional to satisfy everybody: and it took two years!

And then Dr. Clifford tells us that the product is "a register of theological thinking at the close of the nineteenth century"! It is amazing: it is painful. Nothing can possibly excuse the grotesque statism; but it is a statement which gives the unconsulted Free Churchmen a right to speak.

Dr. Clifford also tells us that this Catechism is "the result of the labours of a theological syndicate." It is an arresting word. We are getting familiar with it. A syndicate, as often as not, is a "corner" of shrewd men who take over a stranded concern at a price, in the hope of reconstructing it, writing off its bad debts, watering the stock, and running the concern in a different way.

A careful reading of this Catechism quite justifies Dr. Clifford's arresting word.

There were several very bad debts. Not one leaves a trace in the new prospectus or the fresh statement of affairs. In the old Catechisms, the people who would not or could not believe in them were soundly damned. In this new one, Dr. Clifford and his friends are more than civil. They do not even refer to the old damnable offence of unbelief in their doctrines; and where the unlovely burning mountain stood, even for sinners, there is—vacancy!

For the rest, we have the most depressing and uncritical repetition of old, old dogmas, made, as a rule, as perfunctory and official as any theological drill-sergeant could desire, and as vague as any astute compromiser could wish.

But it is not all perfunctory and vague. Some of the assertions left are palpable enough: such, for instance, as that we can be separated from God (in whom we all live and move and have our being!), and that we are all unable to cleanse our hearts or make amends for our offences, though we shall be separated from God and be exposed to "eternal death" if we fail to get that done.

We all know Dr. Horton's rationalistic books on the Bible, and Professor Adeney's pitying dismissal of the old conceit that inspiration means accuracy, and Mr. Snell's fiery criticisms of "The Word of God;" and we know that every man worth counting agrees with them: and yet here is this Catechism adopting and endorsing the phrase "God's Word written" as true of the Bible! Who believes literally that the Bible as it stands is "God's Word written"? It was just an old phrase which survived, but it will soon prove a new fetter that will gall, if people take it seriously.

Here are other specimens of belated divinity:—"Man was made innocent at the first, yet he fell into disobedience." All the bright men behind even this Catechism know better. Man is not a fallen, he is a rising creature; and the old Genesis story is simply unscientific and untrue. Everyone knows that who knows that Evolution is the law of life; and that man began at the bottom. Dr. Horton knows it. Dr. Clifford knows it. They all know it.

"The Son of God was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary." It is not necessary to discuss that. It is only necessary to point out the extreme danger of trying to hammer afresh this link in the chain. The modern world will resent it. What will the consequence be? The world never wanted Jesus more than it wants him now: but it wants a brother man, one of us, whose real manhood is a revelation of ours; and whose sonship to God is a symbol of ours, because it was the same. The Church of Rome and our own extreme Churches think to preserve him to us by re-creating him magically on the altar; thus keeping up the old delusion. What we really want is to reverse the process. We want Jesus in the streets, in politics, in the Stock Exchange, in the newspaper offices, in Trade Unions both of masters and of men: but so long as this magic-mongering goes on we shall miss his real grip.

But, though the subject is a tempting one, let this suffice. The good men who are responsible for this New Catechism had a great chance. They have missed it. They might have come within measurable distance at least of modern thought and modern needs, and they have chosen to take refuge in old-world platitudes and doubtful dogmas. They might have gone out to the sunshine in the open, but they have only put their candle end on a save-all, and kept it in the crypt.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

SIR,—In your issue of a fortnight since I noticed Mr. Roper's kind reference to the work of the Manchester Domestic Mission, and it has stimulated a desire to make another effort to obtain more teachers for our Sunday-school at Willert-street.

My faith in the religious life of the churches in the Manchester district leads me to believe that our case has only to be clearly stated to secure the assistance we so much need. Last Sunday there were upwards of 220 scholars present whose ages ranged from four years to twenty-six, and we had only seven teachers in attendance, including the superintendent. When we take into consideration the class of children we have to do with, the impossibility of doing the good we ought is obvious. We have nearly 300 names on our books, and are compelled to refuse others every Sunday for lack of teaching help, though our schoolrooms would accommodate another 100.

What a pity this is; and it would be felt to be so, if our friends knew from what a neighbourhood and from what homes these children come, and if they also knew how we have been able to reach the parents through the children. Our opportunities are really great and full of promise—therefore our appeal is urgent.

I am glad to say that the Blackley Church rendered valuable assistance by supplying us with three or four teachers every Sunday for several weeks up to the end of last year, and we are hoping this help will be continued. Will not some others of our surrounding churches take this matter up and do likewise?

It may be asked why not make teachers of some of the elder scholars? We do as far as we can, but these children need the influence of people of some culture, that every word and action may be expressive of something better and higher than they at present know. I shall be most glad to hear of any who will volunteer for this work, and would venture to suggest that where it is impossible for teachers to attend every Sunday, parties be organised to take classes on alternate Sundays.

I need not say what a boon this help would be, and that this work must be done if our churches are going to do their share to lift the children to better and purer life than is being lived to-day in districts such as this in which I am called to labour.

THERE'S a ship named Sometime,
Men dream of it and wait,
One on the shore impatient,
And one at the household gate,
Thinking, "if it come not in the morn
Then in the evening it may."
But one I know, not thinking of ships,
Who worked till the close of day,
Lifting his eyes at the evening time,
Lo! there his ship at anchor lay.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. THOMAS HINCKS.

THE Rev. Thomas Hincks, whose death at Clifton we briefly recorded last week, was born at Exeter, July 15, 1818. His father, the Rev. William Hincks, was at that time minister of George's Meeting, and his grandfather, the Rev. Thomas Dix Hincks, who had been for many years minister at Cork, had recently removed to Belfast, as Professor of Hebrew. Only the first four years of Thomas Hincks's life were spent at Exeter, for in 1822 the Rev. William Hincks removed to Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, and in 1827 to Manchester College, York. In 1839, when the College was returning to Manchester, he removed to London and became minister of Stamford-street Chapel, while during the first five years of its existence, from July, 1842, he was also Editor of this journal. Latterly he was Professor of Natural History in University College, Toronto, and died there in 1871.

Thomas Hincks was for some years a pupil in the Belfast Academical Institution, where among his tutors was the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom, ten years his senior. In 1833 he entered Manchester College at York, for the first year as a lay student, but then went through the whole theological course. In 1840, during his first pastorate at Cork, he graduated as B.A. in the new London University. From Cork Mr. Hincks removed, in 1842, to Eustace-street Chapel, Dublin, and thence, in 1844, to Warrington. In 1846 he married Elizabeth, daughter of John Allen, of Warrington, removing in the same year to Exeter. Six years later he became minister of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and, in 1855, accepted an invitation to Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. Of this his chief ministry the Rev. Charles Hargrove shall speak.

It was in the autumn of 1855 that Mr. Hincks, then what we who are growing old would call a young man, entered upon his ministry at Mill Hill. To its duties he devoted the best years of his life, and though his tenure of office came to an untimely end in consequence of the failure of his voice, yet was his ministry an eminently successful one, and the fruits of it are reaped by his successor to-day. It used to be said that our good friends of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, from whom we of Leeds carried him off, had never quite forgiven us for the loss we had occasioned them. I suppose by this time the offence is condoned, but I can heartily sympathise with our Unitarian neighbours in their keen regret for one whom they were learning to value and hoping to retain long among them. They may have at least this satisfaction, that those who took him away from them did fully appreciate what it was they had gained, and valued him more with every year of his ministry among them.

Mr. Hincks was never what is called "a popular preacher"; and, indeed, the peculiar and comparatively rare gift of attracting numerous listeners, of which we are more or less ambitious, is by itself of small worth; it may be turned to good account or to bad account; often enough its only profit is in the passing pleasure of the hearers and the flattered vanity of the speaker. The only true test of a preacher's worth is the effect produced by his words; and when I hear Mr. Hincks' sermons quoted after a lapse of more than thirty years since they were delivered I know that he must indeed have had a power, if not to tickle the ears of his audience, certainly to reach their souls. There are those at Mill Hill now who grew up under his influence, and who are what they are, and who remain attached to the chapel and the congregation, because of what he did for them. Quiet, earnest, deeply devotional, carrying with his words the conviction of utmost sincerity—such I imagine him to have been as a preacher.

He was blessed with a partner, who was, I am told by those who knew her well, a true "minister's wife," and between them, as long as his health lasted, they worked the large and scattered parish, which is our sphere of labour, in a way more effective, I think, than has ever been done since.

It was in the third year of his ministry, in January, 1858, that he began "The Mill Hill Chapel Record." Monthly calendars, without which no congregation is now deemed fitly furnished for its work, were then, I suppose, almost unknown, and this "Record" was a first attempt in that direction. It was on a far more ambitious scale than is anywhere attempted now by a single church, but was only published every other month. It contained twelve pages, more or fewer, and mostly of small print. "Its name truly indicates its principal function," says the first number. "It will record everything connected with the life of our church. It will allow no member of our society who consults its pages, to be ignorant of what is being done or not done among us. It will point out faithfully where service is needed and in what direction new efforts may be made. It will speak like a true friend of wants as well as of achievements." I am tempted to quote further, but consideration of space forbids. So much is enough to show how high was his ideal of what a church periodical should be and do. This "Record" was continued to No. 102, and forms an invaluable history of our congregation during those years. It fell through when Mr. Carpenter left us, and was revived some years afterwards in a very meagre form. Latterly we have resumed the old name, and returned to something nearer the original, but our present "Record" is still a long way off that of forty years ago, and such as it is, it is to Mr. Hincks we owe it.

Another excellent and enduring work he began at Mill Hill was the Old Scholars' Society, and probably it is due to the very modesty of the first attempt that it has survived to this day. We are too apt to begin with a complete organisation, rules and forms and meetings week by week, and all goes on well for a while; then comes some difficulty—the minister's illness, or a vacancy in the pulpit—and there is not enough energy in it for self-support, and it goes the way of innumerable defunct societies, who died of attempting too much. Our Mill Hill Society began with quarterly tea meetings, followed by reading of a paper by one of the members and a free discussion, and there was an annual social meeting. The first was held on May 5, 1862, and they have never ceased since, only that now they are fortnightly during the winter months instead of quarterly. "I love Mr.

Hincks," said a very old scholar at our last annual meeting, "if it was only for this society; it's the best society I ever belonged to." Happy the minister who is so remembered in any congregation thirty years after his connection with it has ceased.

Our church at Hunslet was the great work of the year 1863. "Hunslet Unitarian Church Mission" was the name he himself chose for it, with "Free Christian Church" as an alternative, meaning to him and to us the very same thing. For no one could be more Catholic-minded than Mr. Hincks. Channing's well-known words, "I belong to the Universal Church; nothing shall separate me from it," and what goes before, too long to quote here, formed the standing motto of the "Record"; yet this did not prevent his avowing himself a Unitarian. Indeed, it is hard to see how a man can be an orthodox Trinitarian and in this sense a Catholic. The story of this church and how he devoted himself heart and hand and head to the founding of it, and how it stands still in the midst of a neighbourhood too poor to be ever able to make it self-supporting, but is steadily working on in its mature years as it did in its youth—this cannot be told here. If it were the only monument to Mr. Hincks' ministry at Mill Hill, it would be sufficient by itself to prove him to have been a laborious and devoted pastor. I cannot speak of much else which will be remembered among us of the work of those years, but any account of this period of his life would be incomplete which omitted to make mention of another kind of work altogether, which he carried on all the time with unremitting industry.

It is our chief pride at Mill Hill to reckon Dr. Priestley among our ministers. Without disparagement to any of my revered predecessors, I may truly say that Mr. Hincks was the only one of all who resembled him at once in his devotion to pastoral work, and in almost equal devotion to scientific pursuits. I am not competent to speak of the value of his work as a naturalist, but it was fully appreciated in Leeds, where he occupied the presidential chair of the Philosophical and Literary Society for three years, and spent much time in the arrangement of the museum. The result of his work appeared in 1868 in his history of "British Hydroid Zoophytes," which won him the honour of election to a fellowship of the Royal Society. Of the rest of his scientific investigations and publications I leave others to write, as they belong to a later period of his life.

I cannot but feel that our ministry as a whole, and our Mill Hill congregation in particular, are the poorer for the loss of such a man—a man of good family, of high attainments, of recognised worth as a naturalist, and withal a man of God, earnest, pious, devoted, resigned when the dark cloud overshadowed him in mid-life, and the work he loved was taken from his hands. It is more than thirty years since he sorrowfully turned his back on Leeds, yet in a very real sense he remained our senior minister to the last, while he scrupulously abstained from any assumption of authority, or interference, direct or indirect, with the work of his successors. His yearly visit was looked forward to by all the elders who had once been his congregation, and the younger people were all acquainted at least with his venerable figure, seen in the pew humbly listening to his junior speaking from the pulpit he was forbidden again to enter.

It was a cause of deep gratification to us that he desired to be brought back and laid among his old friends. The attendance at his funeral, cold, wet, winter's day as it was, showed how quick was yet the regard of the congregation for its whilom pastor, and made us think how blessed the man whose work does not die with him, or before him, but lasts to the enduring memory of the worker, a crown of glory in the life to come.

During the latter part of his life, after his retirement from Mill Hill, Mr. Hincks made his home at Clifton, and we are glad to be able to add to Mr. Hargrove's tribute the following lines from the Rev. A. N. Blatchford:—For him, retirement was by no means synonymous with retreat from duty. To the satisfaction of the friends who honoured him, there were happily reserved to him many channels of usefulness, through which by his counsel or his presence, and at such times as his fluctuating strength might permit, he was enabled to assist in the development of the faith and principles that were ever dear to him. With most willing ardour he identified himself with the work of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, discharging with efficiency, and with ripened wisdom, the duties of honorary secretary for the space of three years, from 1886 to 1889, remaining to the last a faithful member of the Committee. Often did he participate in the annual observance of the Lord's supper, on the evening preceding Good Friday—an institution dearly cherished by the Lewin's Mead congregation, from the hallowed memories which a long succession of years have interwoven with it.

For some time previous to his departure from the circle of his earthly friendship he was a faithful member of the Oakfield-road congregation, but his counsel was ever ready, and his sympathies as quick, in all that concerned the efficient setting forth of simple Christian faith in the older Meeting House at Lewin's Mead.

Devoted to the utmost of his power to the scientific pursuits in which his mind delighted, he found keen pleasure through life's quieter evening time in sharing in the proceedings of the Bristol Naturalists' Society, adding ever to its increased usefulness from the stores of his own carefully-gathered knowledge.

And so the shadows gathered slowly around him, until on Jan. 25 he gently passed into the final peace.

Mr. Hargrove has already mentioned the important scientific monograph published while Mr. Hincks was at Leeds. In addition to this and many papers contributed to the transactions of various societies, he published in 1889 a monograph on British Marine Polyzoa. It was in 1872 that he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society.

Of Mr. Hincks's hymns, one, "Scorn not the slightest word or deed," was first published in THE INQUIRER, in June, 1843, during the editorship of his father. In the little book of "Vespers" which he edited for the Mill Hill congregation in 1863, he included among the fifty-two hymns of the collection his three beautiful evening hymns:—

"Hark, the evening call to prayer."
"Heavenly Father, by whose care."
"Lord, in this holy hour of even."

And also the Communion hymn:—

"To the Cross, O Lord, we bear,
All the spirit's darker care;
By the sense of sin oppress
In the cross we seek our rest."

THE FUNERAL.

It was by his own desire that the body was brought for burial to Leeds. There was a large attendance of old members of the congregation at the funeral, in spite of the distance of the cemetery from the city and the inclemency of the day. A number of the Mill choir were present, and sang the hymn "When for me the silent oar" in the chapel, and "Nearer my God to Thee" beside the grave. Mr. Hargrove's address was as follows:—"We are gathered here to pay a last tribute of respect and affection to our departed brother and to bid him a true farewell on the way he has gone before us—way not of death, but of the fullness of life. A little while, and one after another we shall all follow; happy if we can render as good an account of talents given by God and spent in God's service.

"It was his desire to lie here in the place where his life's work was done, and in the midst of those he ministered to, and whose love and regard he won so fully, and so fully paid back again. For indeed it seemed as if, while he lived, his ministry had never quite ended. It came to a compulsory close thirty years ago, by reason of physical incapacity, but for the same reason he never took another pulpit, and remained attached always to Mill Hill, and came hither again year by year, ever a welcome and an honoured guest. And so we, of Mill Hill, are well content that he has chosen to come back to us at the last—no stranger even to the new generation who had never heard him, for they had all seen his venerable head year after year gracing our meeting by its presence—never to be wholly forgotten while the Mill Hill Chapel stands, and the Mill Hill tradition endures.

"For indeed the work he did was not of a transient character. An eloquent sermon is admired and forgotten, an eloquent preacher is remembered vaguely as renowned in his own day and among those his words reached; but he to whom is given the grace to be God's messenger, to feed the souls of men with the bread of life, to shed the light of heaven on the dark and tangled ways of earth—his is no passing fame, trumpet blast blown loud and dying out. His words are, like those of his blessed Master, "spirit and life;" they mould the thoughts and change the characters of those who receive them, and their influence is still potent long after the speaker has gone hence.

"It is thirty years since Mr. Hincks ceased from the ministry. Through all that time he has spoken at Mill Hill once only, I think, and then to a select audience—for it would have been impossible to have made himself heard by a large number. Yet no one can know, as I do, the inner life of his congregation and not be conscious how the work he did by word and example is still enduring among us, and, still, in worship and in daily life, and in deeds of charity and devotion, his spirit is active in our midst.

"'Well done good and faithful servant.' From far away, from the land beyond the setting sun, I seem to hear the words of Heavenly greeting, 'Thou hast been faithful over a few things,' hast ministered to a congregation of Dissenters in a provincial town, and there done good work for God, maintaining and kindling the fires of zeal, and keeping bright the light of protest for truth and love which there have burnt and shone, 'have thou henceforth wider vision, fuller powers,' enter, from the narrow scene hemmed in by life's horizon into the largeness of the heavenly life, 'into the joy of thy Lord.'"

"So not with tears and mourning, but in thankfulness of heart, let us lay his body in the grave, and praise Him who gave long years and crowned them with honour and with love, and pray Him to bring us all safe through life's temptations to sin and sloth into the triumphant company of the glorified servants of God."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A CHAT WITH AUNT AMY.

I WONDER whether you know the "guessing thoughts" game. Let us try it together. I have thought of a subject, and you shall tell me what it is. If you have a slate or a piece of paper you may as well write down the word "it," and let that stand for my thought.

"It" will make hard things easy. "I know," I hear someone exclaim; "I know: you mean Love."

No, I don't this time, though it is true of Love, too. Try again. I will liken my thought to the thing that men put in a horse's mouth; what do I mean?

"A bit."

Yes, a bit. Let us write that down on our slate; we have "it" already, so we can easily change it to "bit"—a bit. Now what is the use of a bit? It leads the horse in one direction, or in another, according to circumstances. So does my thought lead us.

"Noble aims?" one of you suggests. No, for the bit may not always lead the horse in the right direction; it would depend upon who guided him. If a thief robbed a man of his horse and wanted to run off with it, he could make the horse go where he pleased if he knew how to pull the reins so as to turn the bit in the direction which he wanted. But I will help you a little further by means of our horse's bit. How painful it must have been to the poor animal when his master first called him in from the meadows where he had been frolicking about; and when this bit of hard metal had been put in his mouth, how sore it must have made it at first. But the horses we see in the streets seem to have forgotten all about the discomfort. How is this? It is because of my thought. Now who can tell me what my thought is?

"HABIT."

Yes, you are right; you may just put an "h" before "a bit," and there you have my thought.

Habit! Who can tell me if habit is a good thing or a bad thing?

A good thing, do you say? I know a boy who has got into the habit of being a little late for everything. He always comes down late for breakfast, and in his hurry to get to school he often leaves a book behind, has to come back again, and so is late for school. The other day he lost his holiday treat by being just too late for the train. The habit of thinking that punctuality is of little consequence had so grown on him, you see, that even when it concerned a matter of his own pleasure he allowed it to lead him astray. Do you say that habit is a good thing, then? Someone else is calling out that habit is a bad thing. Ah! if you think, you won't say quite that. How about the lad who gets into the habit of being always in good time? We all know plenty of lads, and lassies too, whose good fathers and mothers train them into good habits, so that they may be drawn into the right paths through life.

Habits, then, in themselves may either be good or bad; but anyway they are among the most important factors in our life. Viewed one way, Habit is one of God's most gracious messengers; for pain, privation and suffering are wonderfully tempered by the force of habit. Perhaps nowhere is its beneficent work to be seen more clearly than in Hospitals or Homes where children suffering with bad backs are gathered together. All day and all night they have to lie down and in one position. How can they do it? we ask, when we look at them. And when we hear that they not only lie down, but are cheerful, and patient, and happy, we wonder, and we thank God for sending to that little child His beautiful angel of Habit.

But the power of habit on character is especially my thought of to-day. How important it is that these habits should be good and not bad. Temptations come to us on all hands, and though at first we think we may just taste the forbidden pleasure for once without harm, yet, as time goes on, and we yield again and again to the tempting sin, we shall get into the toils of the Bad Habit, like the chickens did into those of the crafty fox. Do you know the story? There was once a cunning old fox who had been caught and chained up. Near to him was a box of corn. Not far away a hen and her chickens had their home, and the hen often warned her little ones not to go near. But one day, when the mother hen was away, the crafty fox threw a few grains of corn as far off as he could, near where the chickens were playing. The chickens were delighted. "What matter," thought they, "if it was the fox that threw them! We can pick them up, and yet be quite out of his reach." And the grains of corn were soon pecked up. "Dear me, how good they taste!" cried one, "And see," clucked another, "he is throwing some more this way?" This time they fell a little nearer to the fox. And again, and yet again, the fox threw a few more of the delicious grains, each time letting them fall nearer and nearer to him. But the chickens did not note this fact at all, so eager were they for the prize; until the fatal moment came when a fat chicken sidled up to within reach of the fox, and alas! the next moment the poor little thing was in the clutches of the dreaded enemy. Ah me! that is how the monster Bad Habit tries to catch us in its toils.

But dear fairy Good Habit is like the kind man who tamed the wild bird. There is a little bird with wings of the loveliest red imaginable, and as the brilliancy of its colour makes it so easily seen by its enemies, it has learnt to be very cautious, and flies away at the least sound. Now there lived a man near to the woods who loved birds and who longed to make this particular one lose its fear of him. "For a long time," he tells us, "he would have naught to do with me, fled as I approached, abandoned the evergreens altogether, and sat on the naked tree-tops, as much as threatening to quit the place altogether if I did not leave him in peace." But we next hear that when the north wind blew and the snows came poor little birdie could get no food, and then came his friend's opportunity. Under the trees a feast for all hungry birds was spread, and one morning the man noted with joy that the red bird dropped like a glowing coal among the other feathered guests, snatched a tempting morsel and was away again, beating a hasty retreat. "Since that time he has gradually become tamer," says the writer, "and now at the end of a month he lets me come quite near to him."

Thus we may come to trust the angel of Good Habit; we, like the red bird, may find it very hard at the beginning to gather courage to take the first step; but if we persevere we shall find her no hard taskmaster, but one who desires to ease our burden.

Yes, habits are of the utmost importance to our upward growth; but there is one thing rather strange about them, too. We have to strive to get into a good habit, and so far as we strive we are doing right; but as soon as it is a habit—that is, so soon as we do it mechanically and unconsciously—then we have no business to consider it in any sense meritorious on our part. If we do so, we shall misuse our heaven-sent blessing, which is intended to help us make our steps up the mountain of Right-doing; when one good habit is ours, then it is our duty to strive to take the next step higher.

WAY-SIDE THOUGHTS.

Not in some wide expanse of beauty spread,

With variable light and shadows fleet,
One perfect, flawless picture at our feet,
Are Nature's most consummate triumphs read.

Not in the billowing fields of corn and rye,
Not in the distant forests, great and proud,

Seen from some hill-top bare to sun and cloud,
Doth she reveal her tenderest mystery.

But stoop and pore upon the heather-bell
That pales from red to milky amethyst;

Or search a wild rose, into being kiss'd
By June, and pearl'd like some sea-tinted shell.

Consider how the silken blade of grass
In all its supple beauty came to be
That which no mortal's poor dexterity
Can imitate, nor art of heaven surpass.

Then shall thy pulses leap with thrilling awe,

While thought conjectures whence such forms have come;

And still the great divinity is dumb
As these mute hieroglyphs of life and law,

Which yet inaudibly shall whisper thee
Of all thy yearning spirit seeks to prove;

Till wonder merges wholly into love,
And thou adorest Whom thou canst not see.

LOYAL TO THE CHURCH.

THE ideal of one Holy Catholic Church, amid many differences of doctrine, ritual, and administration, unites together all worshippers in the one spirit, in a common trust and aspiration and prayer, as children of the Eternal FATHER. No particular religious community, without a total misapprehension of this ideal, can set itself up as being that Catholic Church, or can set about founding it in the midst of other alien Churches; but all alike, who will learn of the spirit of JESUS, may make their own Churches worthy members of that greater fellowship. And as they learn this lesson of divine charity there will be in them no self-assertion, no pride of superiority, no dogmatic exclusiveness. A congregation worthy to be counted as having its own place in the Catholic Church of God will not be slow to declare the whole measure of the truth revealed to it, or in doing the work demanded of a true brotherhood; but it will be without any bitterness or enmity towards others, who may, perhaps, have a far less perfect vision of the truth and of the duties of their calling; it will be in humble dependence on the one Source of all enlightenment, and with true brotherly sympathy for those others, who also have their own place in the one household of God. And it may well happen that such a congregation or religious community, through that spiritual sympathy with others, will become aware of defects in its own gifts and its own service, and of richer graces in others, and so with a new humility, holding always to the truth, may be led to deeper wisdom and completer life.

In our Free Churches, those of us who are Unitarians and all others who will worship with us and unite with us on the same undogmatic basis, have an open way, by which, without violence to any cherished principle, we may accept that ideal, and learn in our own religious life to be true to its spirit. Whither it may lead us is not our immediate concern; we have simply to be surrendered to God in the communion of our worship and the service of our lives, and whether as leaders in the progress of truth and pioneers in the advancement of the kingdom, or as humble learners and followers after those who show us the better way, we shall be fulfilling our FATHER's purpose, and shall not be without His abundant blessing.

If we dedicate ourselves to this ideal, shall we be without the stimulus which is derived from loyalty to a great and holy cause? The Roman Catholic has an ancient visible Church to appeal to his imagination. He is member of a great corporation, world-wide in its extension, and is subject to an august authority. His own insignificance is lost in the greatness of his Church, and he exults in its strength and glories in the privileges it ensures to him. So also with those who are zealous for the "orthodox" faith, whatever their orthodoxy may be, and to whatever outward communion they belong. Dogmatic zeal has often taken most unlovely forms, and has been terrible in its evil consequences; but it has undoubtedly furnished in the past one of the strongest appeals to the energies and the self-sacrifice of men. The great company of "the faithful" have, as they believe, a place of peculiar safety and privilege, the sense of which effectually dominates their life. But what force of appeal comes to us in the fellowship of our free, undogmatic Churches, if they are obedient to the true Catholic ideal?

Nothing that is presumptuous; nothing that is exclusive. We are united simply for the worship of God, to receive what He shall give, and to do His will. But is there no power of appeal in this thought of God, in this complete surrender to the Holiest and to perfect Love? We are to be loyal to our Churches, because they can be conformed to the ideal of the Universal Church of God; and this is the appeal which is made to us, that we shall be united in the true brotherhood of the children of God, with open vision turned ever to the light, not to mould our thought into any orthodox form, but to be led in God's way, to be attentive to His truth teaching inwardly, to be unwearied in well-doing, as His holy will is made clear to us.

This is no light matter. It is not for the indifferent, for idlers in the paths of self-indulgence and self-satisfaction. It is a call to awaken out of sleep, to be alert, in the self-forgetting eagerness of love and loyalty to truth and goodness, to be consecrated to the highest service. It is a call to prayer, to a more perfect spirit of reverence and self-surrender.

And if in our Free Churches we can be true to that ideal, and make the power of their religious life more deeply felt, to confirm in the love of goodness, to purify and uplift, to draw more closely the bonds of a true brotherhood, to open clearer vision of the things of God and give a purer joy, then there will be no hesitation or slackness of loyalty to the Church. There will be a new and deeper sense of the inestimable value of such religious fellowship, of a great work to which all alike are called, to which each one must contribute the very best he has to give. There will be a new faithfulness in the gathering together for united worship, a new spirit in the ordering of all affairs connected with the management of the Church, a new devotion to all its works of benevolence. For thus it is seen that the Church as an institution is of the most vital consequence to the welfare of the world. In every gathering of worshippers there is a centre of spiritual activity, for the kindling of new life, for ministering to all human needs, and in accepting the trust we have inherited in our Free Churches we are giving ourselves to the greatest of all causes—in all humility we are giving ourselves to God, to be used in the service of His kingdom, which is the true service of our fellow-men.

While, therefore, we may be united in a group of Churches, few in number, and looked upon askance by the great orthodox bodies of our land, we have learnt a happier wisdom in the charity of CHRIST; and our Churches consecrated to the true ideal may have the joy of the larger fellowship, even of a place however humble in the Catholic Church of God. And in this they set themselves in the true line of the faithfulness of CHRIST, receiving his message of spiritual truth, carrying on his work, which was for the kingdom of God, to unite all men in a new brotherhood, as children of the FATHER in heaven.

THERE are those who fancy they know all about the bird because they saw the eggshell it came from.—Heine.

MODERN imaginative literature has become so self-conscious, and therefore so melancholy, that Art, which should be "the world's sweet inn" whither we may repair for refreshment and repose, has become rather a watering-place, where one's own private touch of the liver complaint is exasperated by the affluence of other sufferers whose talk is a narrative of morbid symptoms. Poets have forgotten that the first lesson of literature, no less than of life, is the learning how to burn your own smoke; that the way to be original is to be healthy; that the fresh colour, so delightful in all good writing, is won by escaping from the fixed air of self into the brisk atmosphere of universal sentiments; and that to make the common marvellous, as if it were a revelation, is the test of genius.—J. SUSTENTATION FUND ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Sustentation Fund for the augmentation of ministers' stipends was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon. The chair was taken by Mr. WILLIAM LONG, President, and there were also present the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and J. Estlin Carpenter, Messrs. S. S. Tayler, J. T. Preston, J. Cogan Conway, T. Grosvenor Lee, Frank Preston, E. Chatfield Clarke (Treasurer), Harry Rawson, and Alfred W. Worthington (Secretaries).

Mr. WORTHINGTON read the following letter from the Rev. Robert Spears, and also a letter from the Rev. William Blazeby on the same subject, and taking a similar view.

MR. SPEARS' LETTER.

Aruudel House, Highgate, Jan. 31, 1899.

To the Chairman of the Sustentation Fund.
DEAR SIR,—I exceedingly regret that I cannot be present at the meeting, as I have been confined to my bed several weeks by a painful internal inflammation. Allow me to say at the outset, I have no feeling against the Rev. E. A. Voysey, but to myself it is purely a matter of principle to protest against the funds of this society being given to any person who distinctly declares he stands outside the Christian Church.

I am sincerely persuaded that such a use of the fund was never contemplated when the society was founded. I, perhaps, cannot better illustrate this, than from a letter I received on Monday of this week, and from a gentleman probably the largest benefactor of this very fund. Unsolicited he writes to me: "I trust you will be at the meeting on Wednesday. I cannot be there to enter my protest against this misuse of the fund as in the case of Mr. Voysey." "I can assure you," he writes, "when I gave my help, I had not the least idea that the money would at any time be given to any minister that was not within the Christian circle." Now, Sir, I hold that in all probability this was the feeling entertained by us all. I am told in reply that the Rev. Charles Voysey, Mr. Conway, and others were invited to the first meeting. Surely it was never contemplated that that fund should be given to those who would insult the character of Christ, and to those who stand outside all Theistic belief.

The names of different sections of our Church which were at the heading of the appeal are those of branches of the Christian Church. Would it not be well to take legal opinion on the course which has been pursued, and is likely to be pursued, and would it not be well to issue a circular to all the donors and members of this society, asking them their opinion on a matter of this kind. I feel morally certain we are entering upon a course that will lead to nothing but anarchy and weakness.

I am thinking broadly of the interests involved in our position as a section of the Christian Church. From not a little correspondence during the past year as well as conversations, I am sure there is a feeling abroad that we are doing a great moral wrong to a common cause. I am dictating this from a bed of great pain and only wish I could have been present to have put this matter in an even more forcible light.—Very faithfully yours, ROBERT SPEARS.

The PRESIDENT said that these letters would receive the respectful attention of the meeting, but they would first take the regular business.

The minutes of the last meeting, having been already printed and circulated with the previous year's report, were taken as read.

Mr. WORTHINGTON read the Report of the Board of Managers.

The Report stated that the grants to various congregations, which were increased during the preceding year, had been continued with little variation, and had been gratefully acknowledged by both congregations and ministers. The list for 1898 was as follows:—

The managers recorded their respect for the memory of the late Mr. James Thornely, secretary of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, to whose courteous and appreciative spirit the Board had been greatly indebted, at its commencement, for the harmonious and generous relations that were established between the two bodies, and which had continued, without intermission, during the whole existence of the Sustentation Fund. The loss was also lamented of Mrs. Bowring, Mrs. Eveleigh, Mr. William Tate, Mr. Thomas Thomas, Mr. Michael Hunter, Mrs. Heywood, the Rev. T. Hincks, and Mr. Henry Roscoe, all original contributors to the Fund, and of Mrs. Eiloart, who continued her husband's subscription. The income from subscriptions had consequently somewhat decreased, and although two donations of £100 each had been received from Mrs. Bowman, of Bolton, and another friend, the Board very strongly urged the need of maintaining the income of the Fund.

The report included a careful summary of an elaborate statement which had been drawn up for the use of the managers, showing the condition of the aided congregations and their ministers in the first and latest years of each application. From this it appeared that, on the whole, a gradual, though slow improvement had taken place in the condition of the aided congregations, and especially in Wales. The income of the poorest class of ministers had been substantially increased, and the action of the Fund had been accompanied by an increase of liberality on the part of the congregations. During the fifteen years of the existence of the Fund £15,073 had been granted in 702 grants, showing an average of £1,005 per annum in an average of 43 grants, averaging £23 each. The report concluded by urging the need of further improvement. The Fund was in no degree of an eleemosynary character. Its main purpose was to stimulate congregations to a keener sense of their obligations, and to induce them to regard it as an elementary duty to make liberal contributions to their ministers for services that are, in too many cases, but inadequately recognised.

The TREASURER having presented his statement of accounts, the PRESIDENT moved that the report and accounts be adopted and printed for circulation among the contributors and friends of the Fund. He referred to the chief points in the report, and dwelt upon their main object, which was not to lead congregations to depend on the Fund for their minister's salary, but to stimulate them to fresh efforts. If they had larger resources there was much more help they would like to give.

The motion was seconded by Mr. GROSVENOR LEE, and adopted.

Mr. HARRY RAWSON then referred to the letters of the Revs. R. Spears and W. Blazeby which had been read. He thought it would be admitted that he had a pretty distinct recollection of the discussions that took place in 1882, when that Fund was founded. It had been the desire of everyone to make the meshes as wide as possible through which help should be given to deserving congregations. The very fact that their Conference was of what Dr. Martineau had described as a polyonymous nature showed the desire to make it as comprehensive as possible. He might say that they all would have the greatest sympathy with Mr. Spears in his illness, and, while they were not bound to agree with him, they always gave him credit for the most unselfish zeal for every cause he held to be right. Among the congregations helped by that Fund were those denominated Unitarian. The Reading congregation was so styled, and it was a congregation regularly assembling for the worship of God. Those were the conditions of their constitution, and they were therefore justified in making the grant in question. Their usual practice, when asked to make a grant to a congregation, was to satisfy themselves that the minister was a man of education and character, and he did not think they would have been justified in going beyond that in the case in question, and inquiring into his religious views. They had acted according to the spirit and the letter of their constitution. To do more would have been to interfere with the autonomy of their congregations, which was so highly prized. There could, therefore, be no valid objection to their action, and he moved:—

That a respectful acknowledgment of their letters be forwarded to the Rev. Robert Spears and the Rev. Wm. Blazeby, and that they be informed that the managers have always acted, to the best of their belief, in accordance with both the spirit and the letter of the constitution of this fund, and the rules prescribed for its management, in the grants they have made for "the maintenance of faithful and efficient ministers, to such Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations in the United Kingdom as regularly assemble for the public worship of God."

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER seconded the resolution. No one, he said, desired to speak with anything but respect of the gentlemen who had criticised the operations of that Board and has raised difficulties in the letters which had been read. Everyone knew the ardent zeal of their friend Mr. Spears for the Unitarian cause, and they all sympathised deeply with him in his illness. But when those two gentlemen challenged the action of the Board partly on the ground of principle and of historical fact, their case appeared extremely weak. That Fund was constituted in connection with the first National Conference. The part which Mr. Rawson took in bringing the need of their ministers for such a fund before the Conference was so well known, he would not enlarge upon it, or say how great the debt of gratitude to him. The congregation to which they had given assistance at Reading was on the roll of the Conference, and therefore within the designation of the group of churches for which the Fund was devised. True, that the gentleman who was now elected as minister was not personally contemplated at the original foundation of the Conference, but it was also true that his father was actually invited to be present at the Conference, so there could not be any irreconcilable hostility between the general membership of the Conference and the type of doctrine of that gentleman. He recalled a fact in the early history of their movement showing that it had been foreseen at the outset that such width would characterise the Fund, and he therefore submitted that the Board had in no way exceeded their duties.

Mr. J. T. PRESTON and Mr. GROSVENOR LEE supported the resolution, the latter pointing out that the grant was made to the congregation. They had a right to look at the credentials of a congregation, to assure themselves that it was properly ordered and met regularly for the public worship of God. But if they entered into the views of the minister chosen by the congregation, they would land themselves in very serious difficulties.

The resolution was unanimously carried.

The retiring managers, Messrs. David Ainsworth and Edgar Chatfield Clarke, were re-elected.

On the motion of the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, the sincere thanks of the contributors were given to Mr. William Long for his services as President during the past year, and he was re-elected.

Both speakers dwelt upon the value of Mr. Long's services, and the deep interest he took in the welfare of their ministers.

The PRESIDENT having acknowledged the vote, Mr. S. S. TAYLER proposed the reappointment of Mr. E. Chatfield Clarke as Treasurer, with thanks for his past services. In doing so, Mr. Tayler urged that it would be an advantage, if congregations throughout the country would devote an offertory to the Fund, and the Treasurer, in responding, said that in a few cases this had been done, and the example might be more widely followed.

Messrs. Harry Rawson and A. W. Worthington were re-appointed secretaries, and thanks were accorded to them and to Mr. E. W. Marshall, the hon. auditor; also to the trustees of Dr. William's Library for the use of rooms for the meetings of the Fund.

A vote of thanks to the President for his services in the chair concluded the business.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

THE annual meetings of this College were held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, Jan. 25. The business meeting in the afternoon was presided over by the retiring president, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. Mr. E. Talbot read the report, and Mr. G. Hadfield presented the treasurer's statement of accounts, in the absence of Mr. J. R. Beard.

The Committee's report chronicled the proceedings at the close of the last session, and the settlement of Mr. J. M. Bass, B.A., as minister of the Chesham Congregation, Bury. Miss Sharpe's prize of £10 for Biblical study had been awarded to Mr. Nazarian, the Rev. J. H. Bibby's Greek prize of £3 to Mr. Davison. Mr. Rossington and Mr. Schroeder had graduated in the Victoria University, and Mr. Kelsey White had passed the preliminary Arts examination. Mr. Schroeder had been appointed Durning Smith Scholar, and Mr. Vaughan Tate Scholar.

The report described the course of instruction in sermon composition and preaching now pursued in the College as follows:—Once a week during the session a full service is held at Cross-street Chapel, attended by all Theological and Arts students, in the course of which a written sermon is delivered and two brief extempore addresses are given. The text of the written sermon, selected by the preacher, is announced a week beforehand, and made the subject of written schemes, prepared by the other students. All students preach in rotation. The texts of the extempore addresses are selected by the tutors, and given at the service itself, without previous announcement, to students, not chosen by rotation. Any friends are welcome to attend the service, which is held on Fridays, at 1 p.m. Training in voice production is also provided.

As regards finance, the report contained the following statement:—In comparison with the accounts for 1897, it will be seen that the income amounts to £1,385 4s. 10d., an increase of £99 14s. 6d., which is due to the receipt of a larger number of subscriptions during the financial year. The expenditure amounts to £1,390 19s. 7d., an increase of £51 3s. 9d., due mainly to there being a larger number of students on the College foundation. The excess of expenditure over income is £5 14s. 9d., against a similar excess of £54 5s. 6d. for 1897; but the fact that we have received £39 14s. 4d. from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, being a return of income-tax for the preceding three years, must not be overlooked. During the year we have lost, through death, a number of subscribers, whose subscriptions in the aggregate amount to £32, so that it is more than ever necessary for our local treasurers to try to obtain new or larger subscriptions for 1899 if we are to show as favourable a balance-sheet as the present one. The new and increased subscriptions for 1898 amount to £19. The donations for the year amount to £107 2s. 0d.,—namely, £100 from M.B., and smaller sums from Belfast and from the Trustees of the Charitable and Educational Fund of our Church at Shrewsbury. The stock account shows an increase of £101.

Sir JOHN BRUNNEE moved the adoption of report and accounts. In the course of his remarks he said how deep his sympathy was with the work of the College. Teachers might sometimes think they were lifting the selfsame weight year after year; but yet it was clear that on the contrary the work done each year would make the task easier for succeeding generations. The tuition in elocution was, he thought, an admirable feature. It is painful to listen to a man who cannot make himself heard. In the House of Commons some escape the boredom by going to sleep. It is even more important that the minister should be heard than the average M.P. He also thought that lectures on health and muscular development, particularly of the chest, would be invaluable to the students. He felt that during the many years he had been buried in business and separated from his Unitarian friends he had lost a great deal; but since then he had associated himself more and more closely with the affairs of the Unitarian Churches, and he would like something to be done to show the world more clearly our connection with one another. He would be glad if we could adopt a collective name, and the idea had been encouraged by his friend Mr. R. D. Holt. The present seemed to be the psychological moment for Unitarians to make themselves better known and more visible to the public eye. He believed, in view of the public attitude towards Sacerdotalism, that if, with our heads well up, we were to offer our opinions to the public, we should induce many who are dissatisfied to give their adherence to our faith which is so full of mental and spiritual comfort. We ought not to be so quiescent as we have been. An old student had written him a letter complaining that in so many cases congregations preferred inviting converts to their pulpits instead of men educated in our own colleges; but he thought that was entirely a matter for the congregations themselves. No pressure can be brought to bear upon them; nor would it be right to desire such jurisdiction. He concluded with a word of welcome to his successor in the presidential chair, Mr. Frank Taylor, of Bolton.

A vote of thanks was accorded to the visitors, the examiners and the honorary medical officers. Mr. James R. Beard was re-elected treasurer, with Mr. G. Hadfield as deputy-treasurer; the Rev. Dendy Agate and Mr. E. Talbot, secretaries. The committee includes three new names—Rev. W. R. Shanks and Messrs. H. S. Knowles and C. Wright.

EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was presided over by Mr. FRANK TAYLOR, who delivered an admirable address. He said no college had turned out a body of more earnest and efficient men in its time; workers in God's vineyard, of whom it might well be proud. Its first twelve students were all still living. Eleven of its students had gone on to Manchester College, where they acquitted themselves with distinction. What would have been the condition of our churches if this college had not been established? Some of the men might have found their way into our ministry without any special training at all. The world's course has been surely, though slowly, onward and upward; men have risen step by step to higher heights of living, and Orthodoxy has changed its ground; but our work is not at an end—on the contrary, it is more important than ever. We have been mainly engaged in clearing the ground; now, we must preach the glorious affirmations which are so real to us; we must preach a positive faith, for God and loyalty to Jesus demand it. The college is training men to labour in our churches, whose hearts are inspired with love of God and man; and he wished it and them God-speed with all his heart.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING spoke mainly concerning the new Catechism which was claimed to be one of the most wonderful and far-reaching facts in this most wonderful century. He thought some of its statements were so simple as to be unintelligible, though on the whole they were clearly expressed. It was a feeble production, and in many respects extremely indefinite, and it compares unfavourably with the historic Catechisms which we know. It represents a mere surface agreement from beginning to end. The Churches have been made to agree thus far by the influence of our Unitarianism. Channing's influence has filtered right through the Christian world. What is meant by sin producing death eternal? Holy Ghost, Holy Spirit, and Spirit of Christ seem one and the same. How is it likely to be received? There is a reluctance on the part of the leaders of Congregationalism to say frankly what they think about it. Dr. Goodrich approves of it on the whole, but says that when it is revised it would be a good thing to invite suggestions. Some kind of manual might be useful even to us, as we ought to give our children some definite theological instruction. It is singular that we should be the last to insist that our children should learn the elements of our faith. They ought to be taught what their parents believe about the Bible, God, Jesus Christ and the essentials of Christian doctrine. We have had our Catechisms in the past; Channing's was an admirable one; but now our people are indifferent; parents leave their children's religious instruction to chance, to minister, or to teachers. They grow up with no definite ideas whatever, and often when they become men and women ritualism attracts them, and they have no intellectual guidance.

The Rev. JAMES C. STREET next spoke as an old student. Coming back to Manchester, standing in that hall and listening to the speeches, marked for him the steps of Time. Personally he did not feel much older, and life's outlook was as encouraging as ever it was. He said that about 1853 our various churches in the Kingdom presented a very strange aspect, being half empty, and fewer by far than they are now; many of them without ministers, and looking in vain to find them. A sort of paralysis rested upon them, and many of the best souls amongst us were becoming alarmed. In Manchester there was a little energetic man who was deeply impressed with the condition of things Unitarian. The Rev. J. R. Beard began to write and speak and peregrinate, making appeals to our people in a way not known before. Very few responded at first; but there was another man—elegant, scholarly, refined—in charge of a great and influential congregation, to whom the good things of the world had come. This apparently unlikely man was the first to respond to the appeal: he was the Rev. W. Gaskell. Those who did not listen at first were constrained to listen when the voices blended, and the appeal produced a rallying first amongst the Manchester Unitarians. These advocates said there were large numbers of the working classes who were prepared to listen to Unitarianism, and that amongst them were many exceptional men engaged in work in Sunday-school, on Temperance platforms, &c., and who could carry to their fellows those principles of Christianity with which they themselves were permeated. Why not found a school for them, so that they may have the necessary help? Then there followed as a result the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. A large number of strange applications came in. There was no system of National Education in those days. Many working men had not passed through a Day-school at all, and Sunday-schools had to be used for secular instruction. Postmen, weavers, knitters, clerks, grocers' assistants, &c., applied—a very unlikely crew, apparently. A more uncouth assembly than the first students never gathered together. Strange material! Yet their intelligence was most marked. Not a man who was not deeply in earnest. They were taken in hand by the Revs. Beard and Gaskell, and the scheme was proved to be right. The missionary spirit was very strong in those early men. They came to study for three years, and some have given a full proof of their ministry since. Well, the Board has become a college; studies are developed, and there are improvements in many ways. The institution, by keeping up with the times, has been carrying on the education of the old students as well as the new. The Home Missionary Board proved itself absolutely necessary for our church life. Times have greatly changed. Children in our Sunday-schools are educated in the Day-schools. People generally are better taught than they were forty years ago. Audiences are therefore of a different character. It was right that the Board should become a college, and that its curriculum should become higher; also that its students should be of a different character. In the old days one of the men would walk out twelve miles on a Sunday to preach; borrow a bell from a shop door and ring it on the village green until an audience gathered round. Not exactly this type of man comes up to college now. Ministers nowadays have to face a different work. People did not seem so earnest as they once were regarding religion. Many of them waste their time in fields of pleasure and absent themselves from our churches. He rejoiced that present-day students have to face different problems. The old questions were nearly all given up. Men are less concerned about dogmas and doctrines than ever they were. He was not in favour of doctrinal manuals, nor in favour of parents teaching doctrines to their children. He believed they should restrict themselves to teaching fundamental religious principles, and he doubted whether doctrines were the things that would rouse the people to-day. He had faith in the Church of God, in the public spirit, in the boundless possibilities of humanity; but these things could not be summed up in any system of any Church in Christendom; but the Church greater than them all was the Church of the living God, large enough for all the pure and true whatever their belief, which excluded no one, and into which the breath of the Eternal is ever blowing. He believed that the students of the H.M.C. would take their places amongst the prophets of this Church.

During the evening the Wilton-street Quartette Party, Denton, provided musical items which were much appreciated.

After the usual votes of thanks, the Rev. JAMES C. STREET pronounced the benediction, and the proceedings terminated.

CANADIAN NOTES.

A RECENT Canada letter in the Christian Register contained the following interesting particulars of work in that country:—The churches of the liberal faith have a struggle. They are a voice crying in the wilderness, "Make straight the highway of the Lord." Take our church at Hamilton. Its history illustrates the bit of humor at the expense of Scotch economy. It is said a Scotchman keeps the Sabbath, and all else he can lay his hands on. Now the church at Hamilton dates back to 1888, when a layman began reading the sermons of our Unitarian ministers. Out of that work came regular meetings, then a minister and church. Discouragements came. They came to see whether the seed was planted where there is depth of earth for root. The little band at Hamilton was good soil; they held on with Scotch tenacity to what they had. There is no minister there now; but the people meet and hear a sermon read. There is Sunday-school and Bible class. There is that most blessed institution, a branch of the Women's Alliance. There is a guild and Unity Club. And these are alive and at work. A correspondent from Hamilton writes: "In some ways our people have done better work since thrown on their own resources." . . .

Toronto moves on, with its various activities, as an old-established church. Here, again, the Alliance is active. Browning, also, has a club for the study of his thought. A Boys' Evening Home Club is well under way. A correspondent writes: "Some forty (all that we have accommodation for at present) of the poorest boys in the city come to our church every Thursday evening. After they have thoroughly washed themselves, and have had a light supper of cocoa and gingerbread, they are divided into small groups, and then either read or are read to, or are instructed in some good subject. Last year some of the boys took up Nansen's 'Farthest North,' and this year Stanley's 'Through Darkest Africa' is being read and explained to them. If we can only raise the funds, we hope soon to start a class in wood-carving. After three-quarters of an hour spent thus seriously in some good occupation, games of all sorts are distributed, and the boys play until 9.30, when they are sent home."

Montreal moves on in the even tenor of its way. One imagines that in Montreal there ought to be two Unitarian churches. And we hope the day is coming when there will be.

The Ottawa church, which has taken the name of "The Church of Our Father," was visited in November by Mrs. Davis, secretary of the Women's Alliance. A branch Alliance was organised, which is most earnestly at work. The society at Ottawa is under great obligation to Mrs. Davis, whose work there cannot be over-estimated. A parish board of twelve leading citizens was lately elected. The aim of this new society is to purchase a lot as soon as possible. The Sunday-school is in fine shape. Now the three arms of the church are in organised form—the parish board, the Alliance, and the Sunday-school. The congregations are increasing. Our word is needed, and we who preach it need that our hands be upheld by the strong ones of your land.

THE LONDON BAZAAR.

A MEETING of the London Bazaar Council, composed of ministers and delegates from the churches, and representatives of the London District Unitarian Society, the London Provincial Assembly, the B. and F.U.A.; and the Sunday-school Association, was held in the Councilroom at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening. The chair was taken by Dr. Blake Odgers, and there was a good attendance.

The Chairman reported on the proceedings of the Executive Committee and the suggestions they made.

The draft of a public appeal, which will be shortly issued, and a scheme for the disposal of the Fund to be raised, to be amended by the committee in accordance with suggestions made, were adopted.

The Committee was empowered to carry on the work, and to report progress to the General Council not later than Whitsuntide.

After some discussion of alternative dates, it was decided that the Bazaar should be held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, May 1-3, 1900; and the Committee was authorised to take the Queen's Hall for that purpose.

The following are the Executive Committee, with power to add to their number:—

Dr. W. Blake Odgers (Chairman), Mr. Harold Bailly, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. E. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. G. Harold Clennel, Mr. W. H. Coltart, Mr. Ernest Coventry, Rev. A. Farquharson, Dr. Brooke Herford, Miss Annie Lawrence, Mr. David Martineau, Miss Lillie Martineau, Mr. E. Handfield Morton, Mrs. Blake Odgers, Lady O'Hagan, Mr. Frank Preston, Miss J. Durning Smith, Rev. Robert Spears, Mrs. Stronge, Mr. J. Sudbery, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. Harold Wade, Mrs. Wooding, Mrs. T. P. Young.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—E. B.; C. A. G.; J. H.; A. L.; R. M.; R. J. O.; J. R.; R. R.; C. J. S.; F. W.; J. J. W.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—“By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame.”—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—“JAMES EPPS and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.”

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

BELFAST.

WITH exceptions that may be counted on the fingers of one hand, our forty Irish congregations are set within the limits of two contiguous counties, Antrim and Down; and again, with a few exceptions, they are divided out among four presbyteries: Armagh takes the churches of South Down, Bangor those of North Down chiefly, Templepatrick those of North Antrim, and Antrim certain of the churches in and round Belfast. To some extent, at least, in our presbyterial arrangements, geographical considerations have got themselves recognised.

Belfast stands at the centre of our province. Not by any means that it has memories either of civic dignity or of religious enlightenment that go back to times earlier than many other towns and churches of Ulster can quote. It is a mushroom place, that has grown very quickly—too quickly; there is a pressure of religious prejudice here, greater to the square inch, I think, than you would feel in any other spot of all the world; and there is no place in all the world, therefore, where there is more need for co-operation and mutual goodwill and service among our own people and our own churches. But I am merely pointing out where our Irish churches are, and noting that they are chiefly “presbyterian.”

The chances and changes of bygone times have left these two things true—that Ulster is Protestant, and Protestantism here is Presbyterian. The Ulsterman has in him much of the independence, the love of exactness, the tenacity and “dourness,” and the somewhat formal and solemn piety which are among the characteristics of the Scot; and there is something in Calvinism which exactly suits him. Orthodox Presbyterianism is the chief, the most wideawake and active, the most popular and prosperous, of all forms of faith in the Irish North. Here in Belfast, for instance, its churches far outnumber those of any other body, and its men are to the front in all educational and philanthropic work. There is just a tendency among them to talk of Presbyterian interests as though the rest of us were nowhere; about the founding of a “Presbyterian University” in the North, for example, to balance a “Catholic University” in the South; as though the whole matter lay there. But we will pardon them for this, if they will not carry it too far. It is an outflow of the buoyant life-feeling that comes of lusty health. Would that, when our people came out from among them, they had brought with them more of the old energy and earnestness!

But I am not going to confess that our people have not been true to their opportunities, or that in proportion to their populations, our churches are fewer or our numbers less than you will find in England. Take Belfast. We have five churches here, and our population is short of 350,000. What English towns can show a better record? And our churches here have a good deal on their hands, and are not unmindful of their responsibilities. I do not want to present the catalogue of our difficulties; but friends across the water have been disposed to judge us, at times, a little unfairly; and we deserve credit, greater than we sometimes receive, for good work and a good deal of it.

I have already spoken of our origin in Presbyterianism. When our people came out from orthodoxy, they brought with them, in fact, their old ideas of church government. And not only do we of the present day—most of us, that is—see no reason for dropping the presbyterial method, but we are inclined to think that it is the very thing, or something very like it, that our English churches are in need of and are trying to plan. I have had some twenty years of church-life and work on the English side of the Channel, and now five years of work on the Irish side. I have seen both the good and the evil of the English and the Irish methods. I claim to know something of the actual working of both systems, in churches that are small and weak, and in churches that are strong. And however grotesque, from an English point of view, may be the suggestion that England has anything to learn from Ireland, I venture to say that, had the principles that guide our Irish Presbyterian system been accepted by certain English churches I could name, good work would have been better done; difficulties would have been avoided that caused an infinity of trouble; weak churches would have been strengthened, and churches that died would have been kept alive. I think that's so.

I may be mistaken. No system is perfect; every system may be abused; and any system leaves trouble behind when the people who are responsible for the working of it leave their work undone. But there are certain things you want. You want the churches to feel not alone the spirit of fellowship, but the spirit of unity. You want your council of ministers. You want lay representation of the churches. You want the assurance that each man's just liberty will be respected and each congregation's rightful privileges will be regarded. You want the recognition of the minister's place in the counsels of his church. You want a court of appeal to which ministers and congregations alike may turn for redress of grievances or solution of difficulties. You want to secure that congregations, in their own despite possibly, shall have protection against being made a prey of by unworthy men. You want prompt, efficient, organised help—not money help, merely—for churches that need it. You want to be able to call to account not alone the minister who incurs public disgrace, but also the minister who by serious neglect of duty is imperilling his church's welfare and its life. And you want that the separate churches shall have guidance in their methods of procedure by that which has the sanction of the deliberate, reasoned, and responsible approval of trusty men. Pray understand me. I am not saying that the system we have here is not open to abuse—I have acknowledged that it is. I do not say that it has never been abused—I am not writing history. But I have been hard at work among the churches for what seems to me a long while now; and it is with profoundest reverence for their purpose of worshipping God and serving men, and with brotherly regard for all faithful ministers who are over them in the Lord, that I long for the universal adoption, by our churches, of measures that shall bind us closer together and make us stronger for good.

Leaving this, we of the Presbytery of Antrim have had the pleasure, very recently, of welcoming a new brother and colleague in Dr. Mellone, so that our churches are again fully manned. The church at Holywood, of which Dr. Mellone has taken charge, is an important one among us, its history stretching back pretty well three centuries. We are confident that its fortunes are committed to faithful and able hands. Holywood has taken its new minister to its heart. We held our service of ordination and our welcome meeting a few weeks ago, and it was good to see how heartily young and old joined in the expressions of goodwill and trust that fell from Mr. Munster, Mr. Malcolm, Mr. Patterson, and other speakers on behalf of church and school. Dr. Mellone is just back from his travels, and doubtless he will be glad to settle; "Father Christmas" had already touched the heart of Holywood to kindness; and the respect and affection which the new minister has already earned are an assurance of useful and happy work for years to come.

And shall I be pardoned if I name here another worker who has just taken up his task—Mr. George Slipper, of the Belfast Domestic Mission to the Poor? Did you see that somebody in the south of England had been charging Unitarians with having no domestic missions? I suppose his mistake was due to this: that we do not label them with any sectarian name. All the same, however, we know who the people are who find the money for them, and who do the work. Our Belfast Domestic Mission is on the same free lines as are those of London, Manchester, and Liverpool. Would that we could run it with a stronger and more liberal hand! Our new missionary begins well. He has had knowledge of the work as secretary to the Durning Hall movement in the East-end of London. He understands its needs. His heart is in it. His people have welcomed him. His colleagues trust him. So there is hope that the work will go usefully forward. But the work itself is as difficult as it is good. No one would believe how great is the prejudice that here opposes it. And no one on the English side of the water can understand to what weary isolation the workers feel themselves left when again and again, in answer to our cry "Come over and help us," we receive reply, "Oh, you are such a long way off." Yes! From England Ireland is a long way off. From Ireland England is only a short distance away. Don't let us cease to stretch across the water the hands of brothers. And why need you fear the crossing? You get to the boat at about ten or eleven at night; you are delighted to find how comfortable steamboat travelling is now made; you wake up in the morning at Belfast; and you are astonished at the Englishness of everything, pleased with the pleasure that you give your friends.

DOUGLAS WALMSLEY.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Birkenhead.—At the annual congregational meeting held on Jan. 29, immediately after the morning service, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That this meeting of the congregation worshipping at the Unitarian Church, Birkenhead, hails with great satisfaction the decision of Her Majesty's Government to take part in the international conference about to be held on the initiative of the Emperor of Russia, and trusts that the result of the conference will be a large and permanent decrease of national armaments." The reports of the committee, the treasurer, &c., and the reports from the Sunday-school and various societies connected with the church, were then considered and passed. The report of the committee contained the following among other paragraphs:—"Your committee desire to gratefully acknowledge on the part of the congregation the increasingly valuable service which the Rev. James Crossley is rendering to the cause of liberal Christianity, not only by his conduct of the services of the church, but by other not less useful, if less prominent, activities." The position of the arrangements for the building of the new schools was explained, and the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, Mr. Frederick Jevons, for his services during the year.

Birmingham: Kingswood.—A most interesting lecture was given in Kingswood schoolroom on Wednesday evening, Jan. 25, by Mr. W. Fox, son of the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds. It was an account of a holiday ramble in Cornwall, and was illustrated by about sixty splendid oxy-hydrogen lantern views. The lantern was manipulated by Mr. G. R. Heaviside, son of the Rev. George Heaviside, of Coventry, and the chair was taken by Mr. Lewis Lloyd, son of the late Rev. Rees Lloyd, of Belper.

Blackpool.—Last Sunday evening, Mr. C. C. Grundy addressed a good congregation in the Masonic Hall, South Shore, on "Peace," taking for his text—"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the sons of God." At the close of the service, it was unanimously resolved "That this congregation, being deeply convinced that the time has fully come when the Governments of the Nations should seriously endeavour to seek by means of international discussion the most effectual means of securing to all peoples the benefits of a real and lasting peace, and of putting an end to the progressive development of the present armaments, desires to strengthen Her Majesty's Ministers in their expressed intention of giving energetic and hearty support to the peace proposals of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia."

Bury St. Edmunds.—On Monday, Jan. 30, a public tea and meeting were held to welcome the Rev. John Dale, the newly-appointed minister. At tea some fifty-one persons were present, and this number was largely increased at the public meeting which followed. The chair was occupied by Mr. I. M. Wade, of Norwich; there were also present the Revs. F. Allen, W. Jellie, B.A., H. Bennett (P.M. Church), J. Dale, &c. After the singing of a hymn the Chairman moved a resolution of sympathy with the Rev. R. Spears in his illness, thanking him for his help in bringing about the present hopeful state of affairs at Bury St. Edmunds. Mr. Wade then pressed home some telling and homely counsels, inculcating the religious principles wherein we differ from other Churches, exhorting the people to stand fast in spite of the ill name we get. He hoped that soon there would be a Sunday-school started, and felt sure that from the small beginning there would soon come success. Mr. Sturgeon (treasurer of the congregation) then moved a vote of welcome on behalf of the congregation to Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Dale, and he hoped that their coming amongst them would result in good work being accomplished on all sides. Mr. Ward seconded the resolution. The Rev. F. Allen and the Rev. W. Jellie, on behalf of the Eastern Union, also joined in the welcome. The Rev. J. Dale, in reply, said he was glad to find already the people responding to his endeavours and increasing in numbers. There was yet a future for Bury; they had taken him for better or worse, but he hoped it would be all for the better. He recognised the responsibility of his position and wished the congregation to recognise theirs also. He could do little if he stood alone. He hoped they would not only invite their friends to come to the services, but also attend themselves regularly.

Choppington.—The annual Sunday-school party and prize distribution took place on Saturday last. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. Tweedy, of Newcastle, who gave an interesting and instructive address. The school is growing, and over £50 had been deposited in the Penny Bank during the past year. The members of the church are busy working for a "Sale of Work" which is to take place on April 29. The building needs a thorough renovation, and for this purpose funds are sought. Gifts of goods or money will be welcome, and should be sent to Mr. Jos. Carr, Glebe-terrace, Scotland Gate, near Morpeth.

Clifton.—It is somewhat unusual for orthodox Nonconformists to invite a Unitarian to address them on a doctrinal subject. Such an invitation was, however, extended to the Rev. J. Warschauer, M.A., by the Rev. J. Moffat Logan's Sunday Afternoon Discussion Class (Baptist), the topic chosen being the new Nonconformist Catechism. A meeting of several hundred men gave a most friendly reception to Mr. Warschauer, and accorded a courteous hearing to his criticisms, many of those present expressing their agreement with him on several of the points raised; and a lively and thoroughly good-humoured discussion which ensued bore testimony, not only to the diversity of opinion which the new document has aroused, but also to the growing readiness among Nonconformists to debate frankly on matters which not so long ago used to be regarded as finally settled.

Dromore.—The annual social meeting of the congregation was held in the school-room on Jan. 27, and was attended by upwards of three hundred members and friends. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. D. Thompson. Addresses on a variety of interesting topics were given by the Right Rev. Monsignor McCartan, Rev. Dr. Strain, Rev. Wm. H. Quarry, Rev. A. E. O'Connor, Rev. J. Rentoul, and Mr. J. A. McClughan gave a recitation. Some choice music also added to the enjoyment of the evening.

Eastbourne.—The services in the Caldecott Museum, Lismore-road, were last Sunday conducted by Mr. Peter Bond, whose discourse in the evening was on "Prayer, and what to pray for." The Sussex Daily News gave a good abstract of the sermon.

East London Sunday-school Union.—On Saturday last the monthly meeting of the Union was held at Walthamstow, when some forty were present. Great regret was expressed at the resignation of the year's president—Mr. J. W. Brown—in consequence of his removal from London. Mr. Ginever presided, and Miss Florence Hill read a paper on "Reading Circles in connection with our Sunday-schools." Presuming that no circle existed in any of our East-end schools, Miss Hill pointed out the gain to be derived from steady work and from reading aloud from such books as were recommended by the Central Postal Mission. The details of an experiment at Stepney were related, and the formation of a Reading Circle among the teachers of the East-end schools was suggested, holding a general meeting for discussion once or twice yearly. Mr. Tavener, Mr. F. Jones, Mr. F. S. A. Jones, Mr. Fossey and Mr. Hawkins took part in the discussion which followed.

Huddersfield.—On Jan. 24 the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., delivered a lecture under the auspices of the Literary and Social Union in the schoolroom of Fitzwilliam-street Church, on "The Morals and Manners of our Elizabethan Forefathers." Dr. Paul presided. In moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Hargrove for his interesting lecture, Mr. A. Whitworth, in feeling terms, announced that he had just received information of the sudden death of Mr. Thomas Kershaw, who for some years had been a member of the church, and local treasurer of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Much regret was expressed by those present.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—The annual meeting of the Great Meeting congregation was held on Wednesday evening, Jan. 24. Mr. E. Clephan, J.P., chairman of the vestry, presided over a large attendance. The report of the vestry was read by Mr. H. T. Cooper, and mentioned, with much satisfaction, that the Triennial Conference would meet here in 1900. The expenditure during the year had slightly exceeded the receipts, the balance due to the treasurer consequently being rather more than last year. Reports of the Sunday-schools, Library, Social Union, Tract Society, Men's Friendly Association, and the Discussion Society were then read, the whole showing a state of great activity in these various adjuncts to the congregational life. The number of scholars in the three schools—girls, boys, and infants—is now 427, a larger number than has ever been recorded, and it is gratifying to know that at least 120 are over sixteen years of age. In moving the adoption of the reports, the Chairman refused to be in any way disconcerted by the small over-expenditure, remarking, in his genial way, that the congregation raised for all purposes, including collections, about £1,100 per year, and could be relied upon always to find all the money that was wanted for its work. Referring to the impending resignation of Mr. J. K. Blackwell, the choir-master, on account of his leaving the town, the Chairman remarked that Mr. Blackwell had been connected with the choir for nearly a quarter of a century, that his three sisters had, in former times, been members of it, and two of his daughters were so now, and that his services had always been given gratuitously. The congregation owed a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Blackwell for his long and faithful services. In conclusion, the Chairman asked for a full and frank expression of opinion from the members present as to the short liturgy which had now been in use at the services for about nine months. An interesting discussion as to the liturgy followed. Some were opposed to it altogether, but the majority present appeared to favour its retention and enlargement, and it was decided to retain it in its present form for another year. A hearty vote of sympathy with the Rev. Henry Gow in his work as minister was accorded with much enthusiasm, to which Mr. Gow responded, expressing his high appreciation of much of the work that was done by members of the congregation, and pointing out at the same time how some of the hitherto unattained ideals might be more nearly approached. One of the great dangers of a minister, he said, was formality—of a congregation, informality. A minister had to guard against merely formal utterance in the service and sermon; a congregation had to guard against informality in attendance and in the singing of the hymns. He recognised that it was mainly a minister's fault if the congregation did not grow, but it was well for a congregation to feel that it, too, had some responsibility, and that all members could do something to make the public worship more united and more real.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting of this Society was held on Thursday, Jan. 26, at the Unitarian Institute, Mr. F. Robinson in the chair. Short papers were read by representatives of nine of the associated Schools on "The Difficulties in Sunday-school Teaching." The readers of the papers were Miss Houghton (Warrington), Miss Thomas (Gatacre), Mr. Lister (Bootle), Mr. F. Johnson (Liscard), Rev. J. M. Whiteman (Bond-street), Mr. H. Coventry (Mill-street and Hope-street), Rev. W. J. Jupp (Ancient Chapel), and Dr. Klein (Renshaw-street). Hamilton-road and Birkenhead were unrepresented. All the papers proved to be most interesting and instructive, and gave rise to a discussion, the chief subjects of which were the best mode of keeping the scholars quiet, and the expulsion of unruly scholars. Rev. J. Crowther Hirst spoke very strongly against expelling scholars, however bad their conduct might be. Rev. W. H. Drummond, Miss Wells, Mr. Bustard, and Miss F. Melly also took part in the discussion. There were present about fifty teachers and friends.

London: Wood Green.—The annual general meeting was held in Unity Hall on Wednesday week, the chair being taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. The secretary, Mr. Sudbery, read an encouraging report and balance-sheet, showing that the church started in the new year free from debt, having raised £300 during the year by bazaars and subscriptions to clear off the debt on the building and the new organ. Encouraging speeches were made by the chairman and several members of the congregation, heartily acknowledging the value of Dr. Mummery's leadership.

Loughborough.—The first of a series of popular services was held in the Town Hall last Sunday evening, Jan. 29. The preacher was the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, whose address was on "The Message of Unitarianism to the present Age." Between four and five hundred people were present who joined in the service very heartily, and listened to Mr. Bowie's discourse with appreciative and reverent attention. Next Sunday the service will be conducted by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, who will speak on "Practical Salvation," and on Feb. 12 the Rev. H. Gow will conduct the last of the series, the subject of his address being, "What think ye of Christ?" Much misconception prevails here, as elsewhere, concerning the religious position occupied by Unitarians, and we believe that such services as we are now holding will do much to break down intolerance and prejudice, to broaden men's thoughts on religious subjects, and to make them more receptive of new truths.

Moretonhampstead.—The annual tea meeting was held on Thursday week in the Smethurst School-room, and was followed by an entertainment by the choir and children of the Sunday-school, when Mr. Hawkes's "Little Red Riding Hood" and Curwen's cantata "The Seasons of the Year" were given. The entertainment was under the direction of Mr. H. H. Short, the organist of the Cross Chapel.

Newbury.—On Wednesday, Jan. 25, a meeting was held to welcome the Rev. T. Johnson Stuart to the ministry of the old Presbyterian Chapel. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. Charles Matthews, formerly minister of the congregation, who extended to Mr. Stuart the right hand of fellowship. Other members of the congregation joined cordially in the welcome, and good hope was expressed for the future. During the evening a presentation was made to Mr. R. M. Cowper, secretary of the congregation, on his retirement from office, on leaving the town. The proceedings closed with the Benediction pronounced by the new minister.

Stockport.—The annual parent's party was held in the Sunday-school on Thursday, Jan. 26. After tea the chair was taken by the minister and morning superintendent, the Rev. B. C. Constable, who gave an address on the distinctive beliefs which are taught in the church and schools. About thirty of the children took part in repeating the operetta given at the Christmas party, entitled Inspector for an Hour, with the assistance of three of the teachers, and the piece was very much enjoyed. Several glees and recitations were also given. Prizes for good attendance were presented to forty scholars, nearly all the books having been obtained from Essex Hall, selected from the excellent prize list supplied by the Sunday-school Association.

Tavistock.—Mr. Promotho loll Sen, of the Brahmo-Somaj, preached last Sunday at the Abbey Chapel, morning and evening. His discourses were much appreciated.

Torquay.—On Monday evening the Rev. Priestley Prime gave a lecture, in Unity Hall on Nonconformity in Devon and Cornwall.

THE LIFE OF HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.,

Professor of English at University College, London.

BY

HENRY SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD. 1898. Price 12s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Speaker.—"Professor Morley, the author and lecturer, would be in any case a person worth reading about. Henry Morley, the man, large in heart and brain, is, perhaps, still more worthy of our attention. . . . Mr. Solly's 'Life' ought to be bought by public libraries, presented by rich men to ministers of religion, and read by all who love English morals and English literature."

The Athenæum.—"Henry Morley's life was busy and full of interest. . . . amazingly successful if tested by the true tests of success. Morley won a unique position among the scholars and teachers of our day."

The Academy.—"Mr. Solly. . . lets his subject speak for himself, in letter or diary, where these are available; but he has devoted thought to the selection of his material, and the arrangement of it was to present a real portrait."

The Scotsman.—"A well-filled volume of some 400 pages. . . . it will at once be welcomed among books of its class. . . . to those who would know the real worth of the man, much as he was known to his family, a reading of this excellent biography is indispensable."

Daily Chronicle.—"Not one man in a thousand would have won his way upward from such a quagmire of early troubles. . . . Mr. Solly has done his work well. This biography of his father-in-law is admirably written, in good taste, and with plenty of relief."

Daily Mail.—"An entirely satisfactory and eminently readable biography of a most lovable personality."

Manchester Guardian.—"There is always something fascinating to the student of human nature in the biography of a man who has in him the true instinct of the fighter, who begins life with tremendous odds against him, proceeds straightway to gird his loins for the fray, and after years of conflict emerges victorious. Henry Morley was essentially such a man."

Standard.—"The 'Life of Henry Morley' . . . has an interest of its own."

The Liverpool Post.—"Very well written."

Inquirer.—"This story of his life is sure of a most cordial welcome."

The Literary World.—"Mr. Solly has done his work well, and puts before us a strong and vivid portrait of a man of marked character, of considerable genius, and, above all, of indomitable pluck and perseverance. The story of Morley's struggles to make an income, and to break down the family opposition to his marriage with the woman of his choice, is reading of a very heartening sort."

Birmingham Post.—"The latter part of this biography, recording Professor Morley's work as a man of letters, is the more important; the former, detailing his fight with circumstances, is the more fascinating."

The Leeds Mercury.—"An admirable full-length portrait of a good man."

The Westminster Gazette.—"His life was well worth writing. . . . The personality revealed by his biographer is a singularly attractive one—generous, full of humour, the very soul of honour, 'a teacher of truth, of righteousness, and of love.' Mr. Solly shows admirable taste and discretion throughout his book."

Publishers' Circular.—"Among the countless students who have felt the influence of his teaching as lecturer and professor, the work is certain of a cordial welcome."

Isle of Wight County Press.—"To Mr. Solly nothing but the highest praise can be accorded for the manner in which he has accomplished his work; neither author nor editor, he has struck the happiest medium, and given us a volume which charms from its earliest pages, and in which the characters live and move before us right on to the end of the chapter."

Independent.—"Shows us how this well-equipped, self-sacrificing, and influential teacher was himself taught. Henry Morley won his wisdom by hard and bitter toil. The story of his life, as now set forth, is as interesting as were his methods of instruction; it will appeal to all whose happy privilege it was to be brought into direct contact with him, and to all who became acquainted with his work through the medium of the printed pages."

Daily News.—"Few memoirs more interesting have made their appearance in recent times."

Third Edition. Revised. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

PSALMS OF THE WEST.

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.
"We have in this volume ninety Psalms of modern times containing innumerable beautiful sentiments."—Christian Life.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT re-assembled on Tuesday, and the Queen's Speech fore-shadowed the legislation which the Government are about to undertake, but there was no reference to the troubles in the Church, or to the Irish University Question, on which Mr. Balfour feels so strongly, but apparently cannot carry his colleagues with him. Mr. H. Campbell-Bannerman, as the new leader of the Opposition, made a very able speech, in which, after reference to the Queen's bereavement in the loss of Prince Alfred of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, he gave the first place to the Tsar's Rescript, as the event of chief significance in the past year, "an influence happily brought to bear in favour of goodwill and civilisation throughout the world." Even if the material result of Conference should be small, "who shall measure the moral influence upon the disposition and policy of men and nations of this noble example set by a generous high-minded monarch?"

Concord, the organ of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, which appears now in an enlarged form, gives this month an account of the notable interview which took place on Jan. 17, when a deputation from the association, consisting of Mr. Felix Moscheles (chairman of the executive), Mr. Martin Wood (vice-chairman), Mr. Russell Scott (treasurer), and Mr. J. F. Green (secretary), waited upon Mr. Paul Cambon, the new French Ambassador to this country. The deputation presented an address of welcome, which stated the principles and aims of the association, and referred especially to the relations between France and Great Britain. In the course of a cordial reply, M. Cambon said :—"There did exist in France any sentiment of hostility towards the English people, and his experience of the nation which he was representing at the English Court was that the alleged antipathy towards this country did not exist. The Press on both sides of the Channel had exaggerated the little friction arising from the Fashoda incident, which had only been temporary; and he could assure the English people that neither the individuals making up the French nation, nor the French Government itself, desired war. Speaking from his experience of the nations of Europe generally, he could say there was no desire for war. On the contrary, they had an earnest wish for peace. As to the Tsar's peace proposals, he cordially supported the aims and objects of his Imperial Majesty, but was afraid the practical realisation of the Tsar's desire would be a long time in coming, and many efforts would be necessary to bring about the practical issue of that noble appeal."

CONVOCATION met on Wednesday, and the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered an address, in which he stated the policy he and the Archbishop of York intend to pursue in regard to the present troubles of the Church. It is a policy of caution and delay. In giving directions to their clergy as to disputed questions of ritual the two Archbishops have agreed to act together, and whereas it has been distinctly laid down on episcopal authority that the ceremonial use of incense is forbidden in the Church, and there must be no "reservation," the resolute attitude of the extreme Ritualists has induced the Archbishops now to say that they will hear the objectors, before finally giving their decision. The question of ecclesiastical Courts is also to be considered; the old Bill introduced some years ago by Archbishop Benson in the House of Lords, but not proceeded with, is first to be thoroughly discussed, and then, perhaps, next year, his Grace will introduce a new Bill on the subject.

THE crisis in the Anglican Church continues to produce an endless flow of letters to the daily papers. The following extract is taken from a letter which appeared in the Westminster Gazette on Monday last :—

When will men understand that progress is only possible where there is freedom—that to defer to authority, venerable and hoary though it be, is but to clog the wheels of civilisation and stop progress? To sigh after mediæval ignorance is futile. God's world to-day needs the freshest and most inquisitive minds, who must be left free to explore where and when they will. Old conclusions and verdicts are valuable for the age which produced them, but as valueless to-day as any attempt to put back the hands of the clock must be. Some people to-day are sighing after mediæval doctrine and practices in religion. Is God's ordering of the world for the past 350 years to count for nothing? Was perfection reached when these doctrines and practices were universal?

The writer of this very frank utterance is the Rev. A. W. Jephson, M.A., vicar of St. John's, Walworth, a well-known Progressive member of the London School Board.

WEDNESDAY was the eightieth anniversary of Ruskin's birth, and addresses of congratulation poured into Brantwood. The St. George's Guild, Oxford University, the National Gallery, the Royal Academy, and many other societies and institutions sent their tributes, the Prince of Wales and the Archbishops of Canterbury and York being among the signatories. The address from Oxford, signed by the Vice-Chancellor and heads of colleges, was as follows :—

We venture to send you, as you begin your eighty first year, these words of greeting and goodwill, to make you sure that in Oxford the gratitude and reverence with which men think of you is ever fresh. You have helped many to find in life more happiness than they thought it held, and we trust that there is happiness in the latter years of your long life. You have taught many to see the wealth of beauty in nature and in art, prizing the remembrance of it, and we trust that the sights you have best loved come back to your memory with unfading beauty. You have encouraged many to keep a good heart through dark days, and we trust that the courage of a constant hope is yours.

A COMMEMORATION of Moritz von Egidy, whose death we recently recorded, took place in Berlin on Jan. 30, in the Concert Hall in the Leipziger Strasse, the scene of many of the reformer's passionate addresses. The hall was filled with five thousand people, and many who had wished to be present were turned away. The platform was draped, and in the midst of palms and other decorative plants a bust of Egidy was placed. The commemoration began and ended with solemn music, and the memorial address was delivered by Pastor Ziegler, of Königsberg, who declared that "since the death of Moritz Arndt, no German speaker or writer had kindled such enthusiasm as Moritz von Egidy! He was the conscience of his time!" In his "Earnest Thoughts," published in 1890, Egidy made an appeal for simpler and more genuine religious life; latterly he had given himself up more directly to special social movements, but he remained to the last an utterly devoted and earnest religious man.

THE Ethical World, of Feb. 4, contains a letter of Dr. Martineau's on the Ethics of Gambling written in 1891, and now for the first time published by his permission. In the course of the letter Dr. Martineau says:—

"Gambling, I suppose, has its inner source in the competitive passion, or love of superiority, with the addition (distinguishing it from chess or cricket) of the love of gain. The former is irreproachable where both parties wish to settle their relation by a trial of skill. The latter is always mean and base when the gain to one's self is simply loss to another. The consent of that other no doubt distinguishes the act from thieving; but when you remember that he would not have consented except in the hope of making you the loser, the whole bargain assumes an ignoble character.

"Then, in the rational estimate of consequences, the practice of gambling surely has no less demerit. The moment the simple excitement of competition of skill becomes insufficient without the money stake, the taint of moral character—the contented gain at others' expense—has set in; and that the stake is twopence instead of twenty pounds, makes no more moral difference than there is between a theft of twopence and a theft of twenty pounds. The mischief, of course, increases enormously with high play; but the immorality does not wait to begin with the swollen amount, so as to be a mere question of degree. There are many cases of morals, no doubt, where the division between right and wrong lies somewhere along a line of degree—e.g., in the ethics of appetite. But this is always where the primitive impulse has itself a blameless beginning and defined function, beyond which excess sets in and runs into ever-deeper guilt. In gambling the initial principle—gain by another's loss—is vicious and vitiating."

To the February number of the Seed-sower the Rev. L. P. Jacks contributes an article on the "New Free Church Catechism," which we commend to the attention of our readers. We had hoped, as Mr. Jacks says, that the gulf between the thought of our Nonconformist brethren on religious matters and our own was growing less, and that from both sides there had been a movement of approximation.

But if this Catechism really represents them it proves that they are untouched, or almost untouched, by the intellectual movement of the time, that they are seeking to protect themselves from that movement as from an injurious influence, and that they are still prepared, in their fortress of dogma, to hurl defiance at history and criticism. More than ever, therefore, must we feel ourselves isolated in our attempt to maintain the religious life in strict harmony with the highest and freest intellectual activity. To do this is the peculiar vocation which God has given us in this time. We had hoped, we still hope, that others share that vocation with ourselves—for what matters it who does the work of God so long as God's work is done? But this voice from our brother Nonconformist gives us no encouragement, no sympathy, seeming rather to sound a note of challenge against that for which we exist. No Unitarian will read the Catechism, therefore, without feeling that his own part in the religious life of the age is more necessary, more urgently called for by God and man.

HAVING concluded his examination of the new Catechism, Mr. Jacks adds some further very pointed questions and answers on his own account. No. 35 in the Catechism runs as follows:—

Q.—What is the essential mark of a true branch of the Catholic Church?

A.—The presence of Christ, through His indwelling Spirit, manifested in holy life and fellowship.

To which Mr. Jacks adds:

Q.—What authority is that by which the framers of the Catechism determine in a given case whether "the essential mark" is or is not present?

A.—No authority exists: to assume that it does is contrary to the teachings of Christ and to the principles of Non-conformity.

Q.—When, therefore, the presence of the "mark" is a matter of dispute, in what position do the framers of the Catechism stand?

A.—They are in a hopeless dilemma.

Q.—Is the "mark" ever found in a Unitarian Community?

A.—As often as in any other.

Q.—Why, then, are Unitarians excluded from the National Union of Free Churches?

A.—Because they do not accept its theology.

Q.—What, therefore, is the value of its freedom?

A.—It is a violent and arbitrary misuse of the term.

Q. and A. 36 run:

Q.—What is a Free Church?

A.—A Free Church is one which acknowledges none but Jesus Christ as Head . . .

To which we add:

Q.—Does it follow from this that a Church which acknowledges none but God the Father as Head cannot be free?

A.—It does.

Q.—Who are responsible for this monstrous implication?

A.—The Committee of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches.

THE Mill Hill Pulpit for this month contains two sermons by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, dealing with the new Free Church Catechism, the first "A Welcome," the second "A Protest." These sermons should be widely read, and will be found useful by postal mission workers (to be had at Essex Hall, 1d.). In the first sermon Mr. Hargrove thankfully acknowledges the progress and the milder theological statement of the new Catechism as compared with the Westminster Confession of Faith. But towards the conclusion he adds:—

Yet it is quite clear to any Unitarian who reads the Catechism carefully that not only are we excommunicated by its requirements, but that care has been taken to guard against suspicion of sympathy with us. Be it so. It is natural and inevitable. The gulf which of old was fixed between Unitarians and those who claimed to be orthodox, was too deep and wide to be filled up in a generation; yet we hail with heart-felt satisfaction this sign that it is less profound than it was, our differences are not so fundamental, our contradictions are giving place to divergencies of statement, we are drawing nearer to one another, though we yet must needs stand apart.

So much has been accomplished in less than half-a-century; would it not be faithless to despair that another century may bring us into line with many of our brethren now alien to us, so that we may share their councils for the advancement of God's kingdom in Leeds and England and the world? And shall we not go on hoping that a thousand years, which is but one of God's days, may bring about a communion of all "true worshippers who worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

The second sermon is a timely protest against indifference to strict veracity in theological statement, and the too easy agreement in a form of words where there is no real agreement of faith. Mr. Hargrove shows how Unitarians might find a meaning for the orthodox phraseology, and so seem to agree with the members of other Churches, and escape their present disabilities, but it would be no real service to religion, and they are called to bear a nobler witness.

THE funeral of the late Dr. C. A. Berry, minister of the Queen-street Congregational Church, Wolverhampton, took place on Saturday last, and was attended by the Mayor and Corporation, and by the rector of St. Peter's. In the course of an address in the chapel, where the deceased had ministered for fifteen years, Dr. Mackennal said of him:—

The secret of Berry's influence—an influence unique among our Churches of this generation—was his personal charm. Intellectual power he had, promptitude in action, the sense of language, and great aptitude of thought. He was frank, he was thorough, he was brave; single-eyed, simple-hearted, patient, strong. But the inmost man was distinguished by an exquisite tenderness; he was tender in affection, tender of conscience, he had a great tenderness of faith. His masterful speech concealed from the world his sensitive soul; those who knew him best were aware that he spoke so vehemently, not because he was trying to bear down all before him, but because he himself was borne along by force of conviction and fervent purpose. He had a rare gift of feeling with those whom he was addressing, and of directing his speech to meet their needs.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following note:—"Mr. Hargrove, in his admirable appreciative notice of his predecessor, the Rev. Thomas Hincks, tells us of references to sermons preached by him thirty years ago, and still remembered by members of the Mill Hill congregation. May one who had the privilege of listening to Mr. Hincks sixty years ago in his student days record the abiding impression made upon him by two discourses delivered in St. Saviourgate Chapel—one founded on the text, 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever'; the other, and even more impressive one, 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' The beautiful style, the unaffected, yet forcible delivery, the fine figure and expressive countenance of the young preacher produced a never-to-be-forgotten effect on one, perhaps the only survivor among his auditors, who is gratified to have an opportunity of adding his testimony to that of younger and more frequent hearers."

THE noblest spirits are most sensible of the possibility of error, and the weakest do most hardly lay down an error.—Benjamin Whichcote.

THE soul is a spyglass, and distance is but a trick of nature, so that William Blake said—"Height of the sky? I touch it with my stick!" So Paradise is no separation. Active faith can bring all heaven before our eyes, and make it the region we are in—not one of those foreign parts, such as we call Russia, China, or Japan.—C. A. Bartol.

LITERATURE.

DOCTRINE AND DEVELOPMENT.*

WHILE the new "Free Church Catechism" may be taken to indicate the average condition of theological opinion in the so-called orthodox Churches, there have recently appeared two striking and ably written works by Anglican clergymen which probably furnish a tolerably accurate forecast of what will be the dominant theological views in this country by the middle of the twentieth century. One of the books we refer to is the Rev. C. E. Beeby's very brilliant and interesting volume of sermons entitled "Creed and Life," and the other is the no less important collection of University discourses by Dr. Rashdall which we are now about to examine. These two books show that the orthodoxy of the future will bear a very close resemblance to the theological and Christological views now held by the more conservative section of present Unitarians; and it is an interesting matter for speculation what will be the theological attitude of our Free Churches when orthodoxy in general has advanced to the position at which Mr. Beeby and Dr. Rashdall now stand. Our Churches also will have undergone great changes, and the all-important question for us is whether those changes shall be such as to still leave us philosophically and theologically in close sympathy and union with what is vital and characteristic in the thought and belief of Christendom. The works we have mentioned are particularly important and suggestive for another reason also. They respectively represent the two different lines of theological speculation which are every day becoming more clearly distinguishable, both in our own little communion and also in the greater world of orthodox Christianity. Mr. Beeby's book gives expression to what is probably the most living and powerful thought-movement in the Churches—namely, the growing disposition to think and speak of the essential immanence of God, both in Nature and in the individual—a view which is sometimes called "Christian Pantheism," the distinctive feature of which is that it makes the Incarnation of God in humanity, and pre-eminently in Jesus, the central dogma of theology. This emphasising of the Incarnation is generally accompanied, as in Mr. Beeby's case, with a partially agnostic view of the nature of man's possible insight into the inner essence and life of God. It is contended that God in His absolute nature cannot be made an intelligible object of human thought and knowledge, and that He can be conceived only under the limitations in which He is presented in the self-consciousness of man. Those who are in this line of philosophical development are disinclined to speak of God as a "mind" or "person," though they readily concede that all that is excellent in our finite personalities is involved and transcended in His inner life. Mr. Rashdall's book, on the other hand, is representative of the older type of Theism which is expounded in the great works of Dr. Martineau, and of Professor Flint, as well as in nearly all orthodox works on religious philosophy up to a quite recent date. Our author not only lucidly and forcibly argues in favour of conceiving God as a person in the same sense in which human beings are persons, but he also indicates with great clearness the serious way in which ethics and religion are imperilled, if once the human mind relaxes its hold on the distinct conception of the separate personality of God. There can be no doubt, we think, that the chief task of the religious philosophy of the future will be to do full justice to both these modes of theological conception, and, while asserting the independent causality and freedom of each personal will, to admit at the same time that the life of God penetrates into the ethical and spiritual consciousness of man in a fashion which utterly transcends the merely external relations in which finite minds necessarily stand to each other.

To turn now to Mr. Rashdall's volume; we note first that its contents are of great value in two quite distinct ways. The first sermon, on "Spiritual Theism," and the last sermon, on "Personality of God and Man," form a significant contribution to religious philosophy, while the remaining sermons furnish a very suggestive and liberal treatment of the chief dogmas of orthodox Christianity. As to the philosophical portion, it is somewhat surprising to find that the author, who was not long ago, we believe, the chaplain of Balliol College—which has been, and still is, the chief seat of British Hegelianism—furnishes in these two sermons the most caustic and conclusive refutation of the claims of Absolute Idealism to be a satisfactory philosophy of man's ethical and religious experience. Specially interesting is Dr. Rashdall's contention that we fatally mutilate the idea of God when we conceive of Him simply as Thought, and omit the equally essential elements of Feeling and Will. On the basal question of the causality of God, of which Dr. Martineau has so admirably treated, Dr. Rashdall thus lucidly expresses himself:—

The Deity as conceived by the disciples of Hegel does not make or cause the world to be what it is. He merely knows it to be what it is. He only causes the world in the sense in which you or I may be said to make Nature—that is to say, in the sense that an object cannot exist without a subject to know it—except that he knows the whole and we know only fragmentary portions of it. When we think of all the pain and the sorrow, the sin and the disappointment and the misery of life, perhaps we may be tempted to imagine that we are better off than such a Deity for seeing but the uttermost part of this spectacle of pain. For we can at least sympathise with the sorrow that we cannot cure, while the heartless Deity of the Hegelians can only regard it as an interesting object of intellectual contemplation. And we can do something—each of us can do something, and by union with our fellow-men we can do much—to fight against all this evil; whereas a Deity who only thinks can do nothing at all (p. 274).

While thus rejecting the conception of God set forth by the Absolute Idealists, Dr. Rashdall is even more dissatisfied with the theories of the universe advocated by the distinguished Oxford thinkers, Mr. F. H. Bradley and Dr. Bosanquet; and he concludes his examination of this Oxford school of thought with the words:—

I do not think I have been departing from the purposes of this lecture (the Myrtle Lecture in the University of Aberdeen) in warning you against the imposing rhetoric in which an essentially irreligious and unchristian conception of God is sometimes so skilfully disguised as to deceive the very elect.

Dr. Rashdall's deliverance on this fundamental question of the philosophy of religion is only one of many indications that the temporary liaison between Hegelian and Christian thought in this country, which the influence of the powerful and noble personality of T. H. Green had much to do in forming, is about to share the fate of the earlier alliance in Germany, where deeper insight into the true meaning and implications of Absolute Idealism has caused most liberal theologians to repudiate it and to have recourse instead to Ritschlian ideas, and to the philosophy of Lotze in place of that of Hegel. Nevertheless, it must, we think, be admitted that the German idealistic philosophies which have sprung out of Kant's thought have introduced into our theology conceptions of the Divine Immanence, of the Incarnation of the Divine in the Human, which are destined to play an increasingly important part in all future religious philosophy, and which are peculiarly helpful when we endeavour to harmonise the facts of evolution with our idea of God. We agree with Dr. Rashdall that Hegelianism as a system utterly fails to furnish a satisfactory rationale of the ethical and spiritual features of our self-consciousness, but we still think that out of this idealism have sprung certain very true and very influential ideas which enable us to realise much more richly and adequately than heretofore the depth of philosophical and spiritual meaning implied in the words "the Father within us."

Passing now from the philosophical sermons to those sermons in the volume which mainly deal with the chief articles of Christian dogma, we come first to a sermon on "The Holy Trinity." The Holy Trinity, as interpreted by Dr. Rashdall, appears to mean a conception of God identical with that now held by the more thoughtful and philosophical Unitarians. The word "person" in the creed is to be taken, we are told, as indicating a particular property or function of the Supreme Being. These properties are respectively the Power, the Wisdom, and the Love of God—Father, Son and Holy Ghost; and Dr. Rashdall refers with approval to Dr. James Drummond's admirable exposition, in his "Hibbert Lectures," of how the doctrine of the Trinity gradually took shape by the action of Greek speculative thought on certain fundamental Christian facts, of which facts the central one was the Love of God as experienced and revealed by Jesus of Nazareth. The Greek conception of the Trinity, as Mr. Beeby points out, rests on a realistic conception—after the Platonic fashion—of the abstract properties of Power, Wisdom, and Love; and as this Platonic realism has almost vanished from modern thought, the description of the Trinity in the old creed has now become practically unintelligible to the popular mind. As to the vulgar orthodox idea of the Godhead as "a sort of society subsisting between the Father and the Son, meaning by the Son a conscious being distinct alike from God, the world, and the assumptus homo Jesus Christ,"—a mode of conception which one is surprised to find still surviving in such thoughtful writers as Canon Gore and Dr. Fairbairn—Dr. Rashdall agrees with Canon Wilberforce in repudiating such a view as being neither more nor less than "sheer tritheism."

After an able sermon on "The Gospels" of the kind which we have now learned to expect from all who have caught the spirit of the "higher criticism," we come to two sermons, the one entitled "The Unique Christ," the other "The Historic Christ," in both of which the author, while regarding Jesus as in the truest sense a man, endeavours to show that the self-revelation of God in his life and teaching is ethically and spiritually so perfect as to prove that he was not like other men, the outcome of the ordinary evolutionary process, but exceptionally received from God that moral and spiritual perfection which renders him the "unique" son of God—the archetype of humanity, back to whom all future generations of men must look as to the essential source of all that is best and highest, but to which through all successive ages progressive humanity can only gradually approximate and by no means either equal or transcend. Dr. Rashdall admits that the evidence for this startling doctrine, which seems to violate all the analogies of experience in other fields, is to a large extent of a subjective character, and he follows the Ritschlian school in holding that the Christian knowledge, both of God and of Christ, is mainly based, not on reasoning, but on the immediate conviction or intuition wrought in the soul by personal experience of the moral and spiritual effects of Christ's life. It must be added, however, that our author has no sympathy with "the tendency of the Ritschlian school to disparage the witness of Natural Theology or Philosophy to the existence of God and the witness which the existence of conscience bears even to the character of God."

Dr. Rashdall's view of the "uniqueness" of Christ suggests the following criticism. When he says that ordinary principles of evolution will not explain the genesis of Christ's character, it may well be asked whether the recognised principles of evolution will wholly explain the origin of any man's inner life. Certainly they utterly fail to explain the genesis of the men of highest genius in any department; and the reasons which Dr. Rashdall alleges for a unique Jesus may mutatis mutandis be just as well urged in proof of the uniqueness of Paul or Plato, of Socrates or Shakespeare. And, for ourselves, we are unable to discern any serious breach of religious continuity when the lofty spiritual apprehension of God's living presence in the conscience, which appears in the divinest passages of the Psalms and of Isaiah, rises into that grander universality of conception and that fuller realisation of the indwelling Father's love which give transcendent worth to the life and words of the Prophet of Nazareth. That Jesus now is, and apparently for an indefinitely vast future will still be, the highest historical manifestation or revelation of the essential nature of God may well be granted; but why go further and tack on to this truth, which is wholly adequate for all the religious needs of humanity, an arbitrary dogma about the absolute perfection of Jesus—a dogma which lies wholly outside of any possible evidence either historical or spiritual, and which presumptuously asserts that the Eternal cannot have any higher revelation of Himself to communicate through any future Christ, seeing that all that can possibly be known of His ethical and spiritual essence is already manifested in the life and teachings of one particular man? We see not the slightest reason to suppose that Jesus himself would have endorsed such an unqualified claim as this; and, further, we feel no doubt that, regarded simply as the greatest religious genius that humanity has produced, and as the man who in his life was habitually faithful to the self-revelation of God in his mind and heart, Jesus is a person immensely better qualified to lead mankind to a higher spiritual level, and to kindle ever increasing faith in Divine realities, than he could possibly be were he that impeccable and therefore non-natural man which Dr. Rashdall and Mr. Beeby would fain make him out to be.

There is very much in these two thoughtful sermons with which we find ourselves in hearty accord, though we cannot admit that the writer has succeeded in establishing his main contention. In the excellent sermon which follows, which is on the Atonement, Dr. Rashdall takes the same view as Abelard did of old—namely, that "the purpose and cause of the Incarnation was this, that Christ should illumine the world by his wisdom and kindle it to the love of himself." This sermon is succeeded by one on Justification, in which we find admirably expressed ideas with which we are already familiar through Unitarian treatises and sermons. Specially to be noted is a very valuable discourse on Immortality, in which it is argued that the religious experience of felt union with God, which in the New Testament is called "eternal life," naturally brings with it by implication the companion idea of an unending spiritual life. As to the recorded miraculous stories in connection with the resurrection of Jesus, Dr. Rashdall is inclined to believe that they rest on a nucleus of facts; and that these facts are not, strictly speaking, miraculous, but belong to the same class of phenomena at or near the time of death which Mr. Myers, of the "Psychical Research Society," believes to be well established in several other cases.

One of the most important features of this volume is the emphasis with which the author insists that all satisfying religious teaching and preaching must rest on some general fundamental conception of God and of His relation to the universe and to man. "It is my strong conviction," he says in the Preface, "that a Theology which is to satisfy thoughtful men in these days must rest upon a basis of thorough-going Metaphysic; and therefore I do not apologise for occasionally becoming a little metaphysical." Most seasonable too are the eloquent words in which, in a fine sermon on "Christ and Culture," Dr. Rashdall denounces the present belated condition of religious instruction in most schools in this country.

If we turn [he says] to the ordinary Sunday-school, it may be doubted whether there are twenty Sunday or Elementary Church-schools in the kingdom where the altered ideas of the clergyman have introduced any appreciable change in the received manner of teaching the Old Testament. What wonder then if we are told that the secularistic lecturer is invariably the ex-pupil of a Sunday-school? What wonder if the fanatics of secular education fail to see that the Scripture lesson, properly conducted, may be made the most interesting, the most intellectually stimulating, the most philosophical lesson of the whole week?

In conclusion, it needs to be mentioned that the volume contains one sermon, that on "Limitations of Knowledge in Christ," which appears to have no real affinity with the rest, and to belong to a much earlier stage in Dr. Rashdall's mental development. If he had not explicitly said in his preface, "I have, of course, printed nothing which I do not now believe," we should have supposed that this sermon had been inserted with the idea of letting the reader see what a vast evolution or revolution has taken place in Dr. Rashdall's mind during the ten years which have elapsed since this sermon was preached. The discourse in question is an exposition of that well-known passage in the Epistle to the Philippians, in which Paul speaks of Christ Jesus as having "emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men"; and Dr. Rashdall tells us that there now "seems to be very pressing reasons why this particular question of the knowledge of Jesus Christ should be raised, and why the Kenotic view (as I believe it is called) of our Lord's Incarnation should be not merely admitted, but insisted upon and emphasised." Our author accordingly indulges in much ingenious speculation as to what it was of which Christ Jesus emptied himself when he took the form of a man. It appears that he divested himself of intellectual omniscience, but retained unimpaired all his ethical and spiritual insight. Now it is obvious that Paul's statement in this verse is based upon the purely speculative idea that Jesus Christ, before his advent on this earth, existed as a consciousness and will in some real way distinct from the consciousness and will of God, and that this "taking the form of a servant" was a voluntary act on his part. But in other sermons in his volume, Dr. Rashdall explicitly states (as we have seen in his treatment of the Holy Trinity) that he does not believe that Christ Jesus, the Son of God, had before his birth on earth a conscious being distinct from God. The being, then, who "empties himself" must, in Dr. Rashdall's view, be not Jesus Christ, but the Eternal God Himself. This view, however, renders the text in the Philippians utterly unmeaning, and it is also evident that if God emptied Himself in becoming incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth, He empties Himself still more in the case of the advent on earth of every savage, and, indeed, of every member of the animal kingdom; and thus the whole question becomes futile and absurd the moment we have, with Dr. Rashdall, surrendered the belief in the pre-existence of the separate personality of Jesus Christ. It may be comforting to Canon Gore and his followers to note that in this doctrine of kenosis (even in the somewhat mutilated form in which it is presented in the sermon before us) Dr. Rashdall still preserves some shreds of orthodoxy wherewith to partially cover his clerical nakedness, but to those readers who are in warm sympathy with the general spirit of our author's present thought, the intrusion of this sermon cannot but be regarded as an unfortunate inconsistency and disfigurement in a volume which in other respects is characterised by deep philosophical insight and keen spiritual discernment. It is to the advantage of Mr. Beeby's suggestive work that it appears to be in no way deformed by the presence of such "survivals" as this.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Church still holds a prominent place in the Reviews. The Nineteenth Century opens with an article by Viscount Halifax on the present crisis, from the standpoint of a High Church leader, pleading that it is not yet too late for a conference with the Evangelical party, and attempting to show how broad is the common ground in matters of doctrine. On the other hand, insisting on the continuity of the Church of England, Lord Halifax affirms, from a knowledge of the clergy concerned and their congregations, that in spite of the bishops neither such reservation as is necessary to ensure that the sick and dying shall not be deprived of communion, nor the accustomed use of incense will be surrendered. He is followed by Mr. George W. E. Russell with an article on Ritualism and Disestablishment, making fun of Sir William Harcourt and reaffirming, with Mr. Gladstone, his strong repugnance for Erastianism. The Church, he says, is already largely Disestablished, the process having begun with the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828. "Disestablishment," he adds, "has no terrors for the Church herself, or for those who believe in her spiritual character and claims," and he refers to the experience of the disestablished Church of Ireland, and the free Episcopal Church of the United States, as showing what advantages might accrue in this country also.

In the Contemporary Dr. Guinness Rogers writes on "Cereemonialism versus Experimentalism," working out the thought of Sir Edward Russell's remarkable letter on the subject, but grieving over the recreant Evangelicals who seem to him sacrificing the spiritual principles of their religion to the safety of the Establishment. There is also a very striking article by the Rev. Joseph Foxley on "Lessons from the Mass," showing how the Roman service of the Mass contains within itself unmistakable evidence of a simpler and healthier religious life, before the rise of the doctrine of transubstantiation and exclusive sacerdotalism. The elements, he points out, are clearly regarded in the primitive usage as natural gifts, offered in thanksgiving to God, only symbolising the body and blood of Christ, and not the sacrifice of God Himself offered on the altar. His conclusions are that the Mass provides a method of confession and absolution as different from that of the Confessional as light from dark—the sins of the priest and people together being openly confessed, and forgiveness asked, and that it contains traces of a primitive constitutional brotherhood in the Church, which a new reformation must re-assert as against sacerdotal claims. Further, that the elements are unchanged from beginning to end of the service, and that which is spiritually signified is not in them, but is inward to the receivers, and that what is called the Adoration is of mediæval origin. Referring, in a Postscript, to Mr. Mallock's recent statement that "the Church of Rome is an organism endowed with a single brain," Mr. Foxley remarks:—

For light on this I often used to grope,
How men with brains could bow before the Pope;

But kindly Mr. Mallock now explains:

The Pope's disciples do not use their brains.

To that form of intellectual suicide, he adds, with some illogical modifications, Ritualism invites us.

In the same Review M. Francis de Pressensé makes a serious and urgent appeal on the subject of the relations between England and France, which we trust will receive very wide and earnest attention, and there is also an article on "The Sirdar's College at Khartoum," which should not be overlooked by any friends of education.

In the Nineteenth Century Sir Henry Howarth writes, as a very superior man of the world, "Some plain words about the Tsar's New Gospel of Peace"—words which would have commanded more respect from thoughtful readers, if the references to the Tsar's "pietistic appeal," to "hysterical meetings," "highly sensitive orators," "all this bastard enthusiasm among a very limited and very largely senseless class," had not betrayed the strong bias of the writer. The following article by Mr. H. T. Wyatt on "War as the Supreme Test of National Value," from somewhat the same point of view as regard the inevitableness of war, is written in a tone far worthier of attention. To this we have referred in another column. A salutary article by Dr. Sinclair Coghill on "The Prevention of Consumption" should also be noted.

TENTERDEN CHAPEL.

THE Tenterden Almanac and Directory, published by Mr. Walter Thomson, the junior deacon of the Ashford-road Chapel, contains this year some interesting particulars as to the old "Meeting House," and the following list of its Ministers, which will be of interest to our readers.

The chapel is the oldest Nonconformist place of worship in the district, the congregation dating from the ejection of the Vicar of Tenterden in 1662, or thereabouts, when he became its first minister. The present building, erected in the reign of William III., was rebuilt in 1746. A new front was added in 1887. The chapel-house was built in 1769, and is the residence of the minister.

List of Ministers.

GEORGE HAWES, circa 1662. Sometime Vicar of St. Mildred's, Tenterden. One of the eighty clergymen of Kent deprived of their livings by the Act of Uniformity in 1662.

JOSEPH USBORNE, or OSBORN, temp. James II. and William III. Presented by Oliver Cromwell to the Vicarage of Senenden, July 20th, 1658. Greatly beloved by the people there, and at the Restoration urged to remain, with the promise of a better living should he conform; but scruples against the Act of Uniformity prevented, and saying "that faith and a good conscience stood him in more stead than a hundred livings," he quitted that Vicarage in 1662. After this he lived and preached at Staplehurst, Heathfield, Brighthelmstone (Brighton), Peckham in London (about 1681), and Ashford. Thence he came to Tenterden, and continued as minister about nine years, during which time it is supposed the chapel was built. He spent nine years more at Bearsted, where he concluded his ministry; and, returning to Staplehurst, died there in 1714. In the Staplehurst parish registers an entry reads:—"1714

(5) Jan. 3 buried Jos. Usborn," and in the churchyard, near the south porch, is an altar tomb, on one side of which is this inscription:—"Here's interred ye body of Mr. Joseph Usborne, Minister of ye Gospel, who departed this life December ye 28, 1714, aged 85 years."

JOHN HAMMOND, A.D. 1715. Presbyterian minister here in 1715 with 300 hearers. The dates of his appointment and of his death are not known, but he was living in 1729.

[Three other Presbyterian ministers were residing at Tenterden between the years 1726 and 1744—namely:—

Nicholas Warren, 1726–1727. Removed from Norton, in Derbyshire, about 1726, but went to Cranbrook in 1727. He was there in 1742, and is said to have been attached to a certain form of prayer, so that the congregation declined under him; in the latter part of his life he went to Church. While at Tenterden he was probably assistant to Mr. John Hammond.

Thomas James, died 1733, of whom little is known. His burial is thus recorded in the parish registers:—"1733 Ffeby first, Mr. Thomas James, Clerk, Presbyterian, æt. 74."

Robert James, circa 1740, appointed in 1744, together with Mr. William James and others, trustee to a fund raised in 1729 towards the maintenance of the Minister of the congregation of Protestant Dissenters. Of this fund the Rev. John Hammond was one of the original trustees.

It does not appear that either of these three was a regular minister of the congregation, but there is little doubt that they officiated from time to time.]

THOMAS MEREMOTH, 1734–1744. Settled at Tenterden when a young man in 1734, and remained till February, 1744, after which he joined the Church of England. The first entries in the Chapel register, dated 1736, are by him.

CORNELIUS HANDCOCK, M.A., 1744–1774. Minister at Odiham, 1715–1721; Fareham, 1723–25; Beaconsfield, 1728; and Uxbridge, 1728–1741. From the latter place he came to Tenterden in response to a letter of invitation, dated April 29th, 1744. He died in 1774 at the age of 84, and was buried in the churchyard on the north side, where his tombstone may still be seen. It bears the following inscription:—"17th of May, in the year of the Christian Era 1774, was returned to its original dust the earthly tabernacle of the Rev. Cornelius Handcock, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ." From the burial registers:—"1774, May 24th, the Rev. Cornelius Hancock, widower, 84."

LAWRENCE HOLDEN, 1772–1844. A native of Maldon, Essex. He was assistant pastor for two years, from July 1st, 1772 till 1774, and in the latter year succeeded to the sole charge of the congregation, remaining minister thereof for the unusual period of seventy years. From his autobiography we learn that at the time of his coming to Tenterden: "This congregation, like all other Presbyterian societies of that period, was of a mixed nature, some Arians, some Trinitarians, and some who were called Socinians. His own opinions were Unitarian, and, unlike the great majority of Dissenting ministers who were inclined to those views, he was, from the first, determined to avow and maintain them. He was chosen pastor with but one dissentient voice, and was elected on his own conditions, and, with few exceptions, gradually brought the whole congregation to decisive Unitarianism. Some Calvinist Baptists, however, seceded, and formed themselves into a congregation, and a few years afterwards others left under the influence of Wesleyan principles of religion, and formed a society, drawing their principal numbers from the Established Church." It is noteworthy that about the commencement of Mr. Holden's ministry, Benjamin Franklin and Joseph Priestley visited Tenterden, staying with Mr. Thomas Viney, a deacon of the congregation. His tombstone, near the entrance of the chapel, bears the following inscription:—"Sacred to the memory of the Rev. Lawrence Holden, who was 70 years the faithful and beloved pastor of this congregation. The above-named Lawrence Holden was born on the 15th day of December, 1752, and died on the 19th of March, 1844."

EDWARD TALBOT, 1827-1869. A native of Leeds, was assistant 1827 to 1831, and co-pastor 1831 to 1844. On the decease of Mr. Holden he succeeded as sole minister, and remained so till his death, January 3, 1869, at the age of 64.

ROBERT COOPER DENDY, 1869-1889, of Chichester. Settled from 1865 to 1869 at Flowery Field, Hyde, near Manchester. He conducted the re-opening services after the re-seating of this Chapel, in April, 1869, and commenced his ministry on the first Sunday in October of that year. Remaining here for twenty years, he accepted an invitation in 1889 to Adelaide, South Australia, returning in 1893; at present minister at Bessells Green.

GEORGE WALTER LEWIN, 1889-1894, of St. Margarets, Herts. Came from Crumlin, co. Antrim, to Tenterden. Through his efforts the present Mutual Improvement Society was started in the town, subsequently minister at Cheltenham, and assistant minister at Denton.

FELIX TAYLOR, B.A., 1895, of Birmingham. Entered on his ministry January 6, 1895; having been previously at Hamilton-road Liverpool, and at Northampton.

AN Australian correspondent, interested in our article of October 22 on various forms of the National Hymn, has sent us the following "Australian National Anthem," in the familiar metre, by Mr. James Brunton Stephens:—

Maker of earth and sea,
What shall we render Thee?

All things are Thine.
Ours but from day to day,
Still with one heart to pray,
God bless our land alway—
This land of Thine.

Mighty in brotherhood,
Mighty for God and good,
Let us be Thine.

Here let the nations see
Toil from the curse set free,
Labour and liberty

One cause—and Thine.

Here let Thy peace abide,
Never may strife divide
This land of Thine.

Let us united stand,
One great Australian band,
Heart to heart, hand in hand,
Heart and hand Thine.

Strong to defend our right,
Proud in all nations' sight,
Lowly in Thine;

One in all noble fame,
Still be our path the same,
Onward in Freedom's name,
Upward in Thine.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM THOMAS MARRIOTT.

THE death of this esteemed and philanthropic member of the Wakefield congregation took place on Feb. 2, and, as he was born on Feb. 3, 1822, he had all but reached the ripe age of seventy-seven. Early in life he inherited a great manufacturing establishment in Wakefield, and carried this on in conjunction with his brother Alfred, whose gift of half-a-million to the Church of England created considerable notice about two years ago. The deceased retired from active business life about thirty years ago, and has taken little part in public affairs. He was a magistrate for the West Riding, and when in good health took his turn on the bench, and in a quiet way interested himself in various movements; but his reputation chiefly on his almost unexampled benevolence. He had no desire to see his name on subscription lists, and hence his generosity was not conspicuous, but his gifts flowed in one continuous stream. Sandal Grange, his beautiful Yorkshire residence near Wakefield, where he died, was a centre from which help and counsel radiated far and near, and when he returned in spring from his house in Brighton, where he usually spent the winter, there was general rejoicing. His broad, tolerant spirit led him to help struggling congregations of all denominations: he gave such handsome gifts to the Established Church that some of his more rigid Unitarian friends would pleasantly reproach him with giving help and comfort to the enemy. It rejoiced his heart, above all things, to help in tiding over a difficulty; for example, among the crowd at his funeral were some Wesleyan working men whose chapel he had rescued from seizure by a private gift of fifty pounds.

But he loved his own Unitarian faith above all others, and supported it with untiring liberality. He had Puritan blood in his veins, and it is worth mentioning that he was closely connected with two of the old Yorkshire halls where many of the Two Thousand frequently found shelter. For some years he lived at Lascelles Hall, round which many traditions of that period linger; and for the greater part of his life he owned Hopton Hall, but this he never occupied. Curiously enough, while his son, Mr. William Hall Marriott, of Hopton, was carrying out some alterations on this interesting historical building about two years ago, an ingeniously contrived secret chamber was discovered. As Oliver Heywood often found refuge there, it was strange to peer into the place where he had, no doubt, often baffled his pursuers, and which subsequently had been forgotten and unknown.

Full details need not be given regarding the series of great gifts which Mr. Marriott made to Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, with which he was connected all his life, and in whose precincts he was buried on Monday last. It may, however, be said that the endowment fund was largely increased by his help and influence, while in the improvement of the chapel and other buildings he has spent at least £2,500. Indeed, the restoration of the chapel, which changed it from a comfortless and decaying structure to one of the richest and most tasteful interiors in the denomination, was almost entirely his own work and that of the family. It is needless to say that all the activities of the congregation have been unstintedly assisted, and he has crowned his benefactions by leaving a sum sufficient to increase the endowment by £50 per annum. While his munificence thus centred at home, he helped many other of our chapels; and to the building fund of Manchester College he gave a large donation, though extremely doubtful of the wisdom of removal to Oxford. As regards local objects he was specially interested in the Wakefield Public Park, of which he was one of the chief donors. The Clayton Hospital was also a favourite institution, and when, a few years ago, its debt was cleared off he headed the list.

For some years Mr. Marriott has had a hard struggle against ill-health, but he bore the burden of increasing years and infirmity with great patience and fortitude. At last, about three months ago he had an attack of bronchitis, and was prevented from travelling to his Brighton residence. This was followed by weakness of the heart, and then by pleurisy, and he passed away peacefully on the date named. On Monday the funeral service was conducted by his son-in-law, the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, assisted by the Rev. Professor Carpenter, of Oxford, who is also connected with the family by marriage. A memorial service will be held next Sunday forenoon, conducted by Mr. Chalmers. As one of the local papers remarks—"His last resting-place is an appropriate one, close to the old sanctuary, around which many sacred associations cluster, and near the centre of the city which he so long adorned by his blameless character, and constantly benefited by his noble and unclouded generosity."

PROVIDENCE OVER EACH.

CAN it matter to the Creator whether I am righteous or wicked, whether I am happy or not, whether I live to a good old age or get crushed under a cart-wheel? What is one man in the sight of God? what is even a kingdom to him, or a world? Why, then, should I be interested to preserve and nurture what He may mean to destroy?

For the drift of the Maker is dark, an Isis hid by a veil.

Who knows the ways of the world, how God will bring them about?

Our planet is one, the suns are many, the world is wide.

Shall I weep if a Poland fall? Shall I shriek if a Hungary fall?

Or an infant civilisation be ruled with rod or with knout?

I have not made the world, and He that made it will guide.

This is our doubt and despondency. Yet there is comfort in the last line—"He that made it will guide." And there is comfort in the words of the Hebrew Seer: "Why sayest thou. . . My way is hid from the Lord?" And a reason for the comfort: Lift up your eyes on high. Behold the stars! The Creator is powerful. He calleth them all by their names, and not one faileth! They are kept together by a well-guarded flock, none wandering and none snatched away! The student of modern astronomy would, indeed, regard it as a possible thing that a star should cease to burn, or that it should fall into a larger star and cease to count as a separate luminary. But he knows that not a single particle of its substance or its energy has ever been lost. Nothing is ever lost: the matter and the power in the universe are a constant sum. They take protean forms, but in an orderly manner which could be traced. All are but parts of one stupendous whole; and nothing ever changes its state without carrying with it the record and evidence of what it was before.

Of, course, then the history of every human creature could be traced backward, and unwound down to its beginnings, or what are called so. We are a part of the great whole. Our body and soul, our life and energy are part of the total which make up the universe; and we can never be overlooked. The universe would not be the same without us. The history of human life—thought, activity, and progress—would not have been the same without us. Our ancestry goes back to the first human pair. All things conspired for our birth. During our life we have influenced the life and thought of others; and now whether we live or die, the world can never be quite what it would have been if we had not been born. It is certain that before the world yet was—when God only intended to create, and had in His mind the world and the race that He would call into being—we, individually, were in His thoughts. And having once been in His thoughts, we are never absent from His thoughts. He holdeth our soul in life: He calleth us all by our names.

Look at the crowded streets of the city; the tide of traffic on the footways and in the roads. The City authorities can only consider it in the mass, and control it in a general way. Their regulations have reference to streams of people and the expected ebb and flow. But each man of the crowd is on a separate errand or mission. He has no desire to swell the tide; but he comes out of one house to make his way to another, on his own business, by the most convenient path. I think of that when I watch a crowd of ants, moving in many directions and seemingly confused. If we cease taking a general survey, and fix our attention on some one particular ant, we shall see that he has his special business—to carry a grain, to remove an obstacle, to repair a damage, to assist a comrade. I think of it again when I see a cloud of dust. Each particle has its separate orbit, and there is nothing accidental about its motion. Its path is as well defined as that of a planet. During countless ages that particle has existed, obeying law, filling a place, fulfilling a mission; now forming part of the chalky cliff that stands as a bulwark to keep back the ocean, now washed into the sea but yielding itself up to help form the shell of a nautilus, falling to the bottom with the body of the creature when it dies, biding its time till it is heaved up by the underground forces to be dried by the sun and blown about the world: but having yet a history before it, so that the world would not be complete without it, and it never passes out of existence.

Then we come back to think of man, who is greater than the dust, greater than the ant, yea greater than the planet on which he dwells and walks—who is lord of the earth, who looks out towards the wondrous spaces of the stars, who frames the telescope and the spectroscope, who possesses an intellect to which these instruments only minister, and a heart that throbs with emotions and aspirations inexpressible. Surely man also—every human creature—has his place to fill and his work to do, and a Divine Providence directing his ways. G. ST. CLAIR.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Imitatio Christi.

BLESSED are the single-hearted, for they shall enjoy much peace.

We are too much led by our passions, and too solicitous for transitory things. We also seldom overcome any one vice perfectly, and are not inflamed with a fervent desire to grow better every day; and therefore we remain cold and lukewarm in religion.

If we would endure like men of courage to stand in the battle, surely we should feel the favourable assistance of God from heaven. For He who giveth us occasion to fight, to the end we may get the victory, is ready to succour those that fight manfully and trust in His grace.

If we esteem our progress in religious life to consist only in some exterior observances, our devotion will quickly be at an end. But let us lay the axe to the root, that, being freed from passions, we may find rest to our souls. If every year we would root out one vice, we should sooner become perfect men; but now oftentimes we perceive it goes contrary, and that we were better and purer at the beginning of our conversion than after many years of our profession. Our fervour and profiting should increase daily; but now it is accounted a great matter if a man can retain but some part of his first zeal.

Resist thine inclination in the very beginning, and unlearn evil customs, lest perhaps by little and little they draw thee to greater difficulty. O, if thou didst but consider how much inward peace unto thyself, and joy unto others, thou shouldst procure by demeaning thyself well, I suppose thou wouldest be more careful of thy spiritual progress.

Endeavour to be patient in bearing with the defects and infirmities of others, of what sort soever they be; for that thyself also hast many failings, which must be borne with by others. If thou canst not make thyself such an one as thou wouldest, how canst thou expect to have another in all things to thy liking?

We would willingly have others perfect, and yet we amend not our own faults. We will have others severely corrected, and will not be corrected ourselves. The large liberty of others displeaseth us, and yet we will not have our own desires denied us. We will have others kept under by strict laws, but in no sort will ourselves be restrained. And thus it appeareth how seldom we weigh our neighbour in the same balance with ourselves.

If all men were perfect, what should we have to suffer of our neighbour for God? But now God hath thus ordered it, that we may learn to bear one another's burdens; for no man is without fault, no man but hath his burden, no man sufficient of himself, no man wise enough of himself; but we ought to bear with one another, comfort one another, help, instruct and admonish one another.

Occasions of adversity best discover how great virtue or strength each one hath. For occasions do not make a man frail, but they show what he is,

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

STRENGTHEN THE WEAK PLACES.

MISS G. MARTINEAU's story from Roman History, of the undefended place on the Capitoline Hill, reminded me of an address to children given by a Wesleyan minister some months ago. May I now re-tell it for the benefit of the young readers of THE INQUIRER?

The preacher said:—I was once travelling near Frome, in the county of Somersetshire. This little town long ago owned a strong castle; and it is said that, in the troubled days of the seventeenth century, Oliver Cromwell had again and again tried to overcome it, and had directed his guns against it, but all in vain. The castle walls had proved strong enough, hitherto, to resist all the attacks. One day, however, an old woman—whose sympathies were, doubtless, on the side of the stern Puritan and his Roundheads—gave Cromwell a hint, which served him well. She said there was in the walls one weak spot, which would certainly yield if a cannon were discharged against it; and this spot she herself showed to the great general. Very soon the castle was again attacked, and this time it was taken. The one weak spot, in the otherwise strong castle, was the cause of its fall.

We may remind ourselves, also, of the Greek story of Achilles—with which, probably, many of you are familiar. The mother of Achilles had been told by the oracle that if she would take her son to the river Styx, and dip him therein, his body—wherever it was touched by the water—would thenceforth be proof against all the arrows of his enemies. Achilles' mother held her boy by the heel, while she plunged him into the river. But since where her hand had firmly pressed the water could not come, this part was not arrow-proof; and through it Achilles met his death. The heel was the one weak spot, in his otherwise invulnerable body.

Now, boys and girls, will you not ask yourselves, "Is there any weak spot in me?" Is it your temper which is likely to give trouble? Then watch it. Are you sufficiently careful to speak the truth? Are you inclined to be unfair in games, or unjust to others? Pause sometimes, and think of these things, and strive to repair your weak places: put on the armour of a meek and teachable spirit, which will help you to become strong in deed and in truth. Had it only been realised sufficiently that there was a weak place in the castle this point might have been so well guarded that even the great Cromwell would have been baffled. It is when men and women do not seek to strengthen the weak places in their characters, by patient endeavour, that they fall into evil ways. If we earnestly strive to discover our weaknesses, and then put a jealous watch and guard round these, we may by and by find that they have been turned into our strongest vantage-ground. Only through constant effort can our characters grow brave, and noble, and true.

FOR CLOSER UNION.

IN his Provincial Letter from Belfast last week the Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY spoke of the advantages of the Presbyterian order of church government, as it prevails in the North of Ireland, as best adapted to serve the needs of our group of churches, for giving a better sense of union, for avoiding troubles which may arise, where there are isolated and not very wisely-directed efforts, and providing in the most natural way the strength and encouragement of a wider fellowship and added numbers to scattered workers in difficult posts of duty. Another suggestion was recently made in these columns, illustrated by what was being actually done by one little group of churches, where, without adopting any new form of government, those who were within easy reach of one another agreed to draw more closely together in occasional meetings for mutual counsel and encouragement, within a portion only of the larger circle of a province. Every such drawing together, to realise more clearly the common purpose, and to kindle the fire of renewed consecration to the common cause, must be helpful. To be united merely through repulsion from all other bodies is cold comfort, and while even out of that may be gathered a brave and patient determination to hold together and to be loyal to truth and the testimony we are called to bear at any cost, something more is required for complete and happy life. The fellowship of our religious life must be not merely negative, because no one else will have anything to do with us, it must be positive, in the growing sense of spiritual kinship, in the joy of a common faith and love and a common service.

Thus, while questions of church order and outward organisation are of great importance, there is something much more vital for the closer union of a religious body or group of churches, and that is the inward life. Even out of the negative condition of union through unwilling repulsion from others may arise one element of strength which is not negative. For loyalty to truth is an element in religious life, when its bearings are clearly understood, of a very positive and inspiring kind. We meet together in the fellowship of one of our Free Churches not in self-will, but pledged to follow truth, to keep our faces turned ever to the light of God; and it must be a part of our spiritual worship, for the kindling of fresh devotion and the binding together in a closer union of the inward life, to see to it that we are all thus surrendered to God, and desire simply to be true to the teaching of His Spirit.

When, therefore, we desire a richer measure of life we must remember what is demanded of us, that we should come with hearts prepared to be taught, and keep open within us the channels through which Divine enlightenment may be received. Thus loyalty to truth in the Church leads to the more steadfast and humble seeking for a truer spirit of prayer, a deeper sense of God's presence and of the very practical purpose for which we are united. There is always this call for truer worship, for more genuine self-surrender to the Highest, that our churches and every member gathered into them may not only have the joy of deeper and stronger life, but be better fitted for the work to which God has called us.

And always, when we are impelled to greater faithfulness, the demand is for a better humanity. To be more loyal to truth, to be more true to God, we must be better men. There is the constant direction for all brave endeavour, the unfailing refuge for every troubled and discouraged spirit. Even in the darkness of doubt and the pain of isolation the way is open. We can go on holding fast to the true brotherly spirit, doing whatever work is within reach, to make our common human life purer, healthier, and in every way more worthy. That, again, is surrender to God—the doing of His will. Here there is nothing negative, but for our churches also a strong and definite purpose, to bind together and inspire with new life—simply to be unwearied in well-doing, to remember that the Church is an organ of God's Spirit to help the world onward to better life, to work for the coming of His kingdom.

THE WAR TEST.

IN the current number of the Nineteenth Century there is a striking article by Mr. H. F. WYATT on "War as the Test of National Value." War, in this writer's view, is the inevitable result of a natural cause in the order of the world, which in its broad results has been beneficent, without which there would have been no progress. It is "simply a phase in that tremendous and ceaseless process of competition which prevails alike on sea and land—in the ocean depths, in the paths of the air, in field and forest, throughout insect and animal and vegetable life." It is admitted, indeed, that the recoil from war is an instance of the "eternal contrast between the upward trend of the human spirit and the physical environment by which that spirit is conditioned," but we are allowed no short cuts to the ideal, and it is absurd to suppose that the phenomena of war, having a natural base, should be at the present time "remediable by a conference of diplomatists."

We do not, however, suppose that any one is so unwise as to expect that the Tsar's Conference will at once make an end of war, and abolish from the world all the evils it entails. The question is, whether the civilised nations of Europe are to remain, without hope of release or mitigation, involved in the meshes of the old war system, crushed down under the growing burden of their own armaments, in the mad rivalry of power, or whether there are now forces strong enough in a nobler humanity to curb the fiercer passions of rivalry and race antipathy, and to find some more reasonable and humane method of settling disputes and ordering international affairs.

Mr. WYATT apparently thinks that the brute still must rule in man, and be the ultimate arbiter of his destiny. War has hitherto always accompanied the movements of races in the world, and has made the way for the progress of civilisation, and its virtue is proved by the fact that "the nations now most potent in war are also the most moral and the most civilised," so that it is roundly stated that "the warlike strength of a people is the true reflex of their moral and mental vigour."

Are we, then, to conclude, on this theory, that the professional soldier is the noblest type of man, superior both in mental and moral vigour to any civilian? Or is the moral that we should all enlist and be eager to fight?

We cannot think that this would be seriously argued, nor should we be afraid, even if wars should cease, that heroism would decay, and strenuous vigour would no longer be developed and mark the progressive life of man. So long as we live in this world there will be the elements to battle with, and we confess that the heroism and endurance of the sailor, the fireman, and the mountaineer appeal to us at least as strongly as that of the soldier, while the hardships of their lot, not to mention many other laborious conditions incident to the pursuits of peace, afford ample discipline for the very noblest character.

Looking into the distant future Mr. WYATT suspects that when the ideal condition of peace among the nations of the world shall have been reached it will be the signal for the beginning of a universal decay. This, he acknowledges, is a purely academical question, and, we should add, it is an idle speculation, for we cannot tell what new problems the better manhood may find to grapple with, and in what conflicts its strength will find fit exercise. But one thing seems quite clear, that there is no sufficient reason adduced why we should surrender to the Brute, and not rather always follow the Ideal. It is true that there is no short cut to perfection, but surely we are bound to trust the higher instincts of our nature, and let them determine the character and scope of our endeavours.

Mr. WYATT mocks at the idea that "a conference of diplomatists" should be deemed capable of checking the beneficent movements of the war spirit; but the Tsar's proposal does not begin and end with a conference of diplomatists. It is an appeal to the civilised peoples of the world, and, for our own part, we will not refuse to believe that there are movements of the people's will which, rightly directed, might go very far to make an end at least of European wars.

Our chief hope of the Conference is that it may lead to some practical result in the furtherance of the reasonable cause of arbitration; and, whatever be the immediate issue, the occasion has been given, as never before, to draw the attention of all thinking men and women, not only to the hopeless economic burdens laid upon the nations of modern Europe by the present system, but also to the brutal stupidity of war. No lessons of past history can prove men to be now incapable of a nobler self-control and a more reasonable ordering of their affairs, and we must hope that our diplomatists and the military rulers of Europe will find that a national and an international sentiment is growing up, which will prove stronger than the old blind passions of hatred and distrust.

It is, after all, the people that must show the way, and by the resistless force of their own common-sense and their common humanity enter the fairer fields of peaceful progress and the new era of true brotherhood among men.

THE moral of the Sphinx-riddle, and it is a deep one, lies in the childish simplicity of the solution. Those who fail in guessing it, fail because they are over-ingenious, and cast about for an answer that shall suit their own notion of the gravity of the occasion and of their own dignity, rather than the occasion itself.—J. E. Lowell.

It is said practical goodness alone is of any account. No matter what a man thinks, the good are of all opinions in all denominations; a man's character has nothing to do with his creed. There could be no falsier maxim. No surer is the body of a creature to follow his head, the ship to mind her helm, the train to glide after the engine, than the life to be chiselled and moulded by the idea.—C. A. Bartol.

THE IRISH UNIVERSITY QUESTION.

SIR,—The country has been thrown into a state of agitation again on the Irish University Question in consequence of the remarkable letter recently addressed by the Right Hon. Arthur Balfour to one of his constituents, in which he advances urgent reasons for the immediate establishment of two new Universities in that country—one with a Catholic "atmosphere," the other with a Presbyterian "atmosphere." I regret to observe from a note in last week's INQUIRER that editorial approval is given to this proposal as "a measure of justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland too long delayed." From that opinion I utterly dissent, and, on the contrary, I venture to characterise this proposal as a reactionary step—similar, alas! to many others which have been taken during the closing years of the century by men to whom we looked for sturdy championship of those great principles of freedom and equality and justice which can never be served by preferential treatment of any sect or party.

First, let me say how thoroughly I appreciate the genuineness of Mr. Balfour's motives in forcing this question into the domain of practical politics, and the fearlessness with which he has grasped so thorny a subject. There are, and have been, few party leaders who would dare to speak their private mind in this way, knowing, as Mr. Balfour knew, that a very considerable section of their own party was in clamant rebellion against such principles. Mr. Gladstone did so more than once; Mr. Morley has well earned the name of "honest John" by similar straightforwardness; and now Mr. Balfour has merited the honourable esteem of friend and opponent alike by disregarding the mere question of party expediency and making a bold stand for unwelcome principle. Not one of these three men answers to the expected qualifications of a strategical party leader; but all three command the confidence of the thoughtful by their manifest sincerity and real desire to serve the best interests of the nation. They are in the highest degree statesmen. Alas that the present tense can no longer be properly used of the greatest of the three, whose glowing genius and clear perception are so greatly needed by the nation to-day!

Next, let us remind ourselves what it is that Mr. Balfour actually proposes. He sees that the Catholic youth of Ireland, under the direction of the priesthood, for the most part avoid "the one existing teaching University in Ireland—namely, Trinity College," because of its Protestant atmosphere, and that, on the other hand, Queen's College, Belfast, which is "under predominantly Presbyterian influence," is not, as it used to be and ought to be, a constituent part of a teaching University. To remedy these two defects in the higher education of Ireland, Mr. Balfour proposes "to establish by a single Act two new teaching Universities—one in Dublin and, one in Belfast—on precisely similar lines, and differing in no particular excepting the names of the gentlemen first appointed to serve on their respective governing bodies." The personnel of the senate and teaching staff would in the one case be chiefly, if not entirely, Roman Catholic, and in the other Presbyterian. "But both Universities would be rigidly subject to the Test Acts; all scholarships and fellowships paid out of public funds would be open to competition, irrespective of creed; no public endowment would be given to chairs in philosophy, theology, or modern history; professors would have a right of appeal against unjust dismissal, and the number of clergy on the governing body would be strictly limited."

Certainly this is a plausible and ingenious scheme, calculated to cause some questionings of heart among Liberals and Nonconformists who seem to hear the echoes of an appeal to the spirit of toleration and religious equality. But the voice is that of a siren, luring them to destruction. That way madness lies. It means the reversal of the principles upheld for generations by lovers of freedom and of equal rights for all. It is the undoing of the great work of emancipation achieved in the Act for the Disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1870. The argument used by some of the opponents of that historic measure was that concurrent endowment was better than disendowment. It is again the plea of concurrent endowment which is raised in the present discussion, but it is so insidiously veiled that some of the staunchest of Radicals and some of the most determined of Nonconformists have been won over by its charms or are seriously meditating capitulation.

While I do not question the absolute ingenuousness of Mr. Balfour's motives, I cannot be blind to one significant clause in his famous letter, which is of the greatest importance and may yet be marked as the beginning of a new policy for any Government of which he is a member. Urging that it is for us to decide "whether Ireland is to have an adequate University system granted to her," he says:—"I hope so, as a Unionist, because otherwise I know not how to claim for a British Parliament that it can do for Ireland all, and more than all, that Ireland could do for herself." It will be interesting to see what Mr. Balfour's attitude to Home Rule becomes if the strongest Government of modern times, as it is sometimes called—a Government which stands for the Union first and foremost—is unable to persuade its followers to support such a Bill as Mr. Balfour foreshadows, or even perhaps to secure the adhesion of its own members in support of its principles. There is no doubt that if Ireland were left to herself, she would soon establish a Catholic University. And here let me meet a very weak argument of Mr. Balfour's addressed to the great Protestant delegation which waited upon him in Manchester on Tuesday last. He holds that all who supported Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill are put out of court on this question, and have no right to sound a note of opposition to a scheme that is supposed to command the assent of a majority of Irishmen; for under that Bill an Irish Parliament would have been at liberty to establish just such a Catholic University if it pleased. But any man of ordinary perspicacity can see the distinction between doing a thing yourself which you do not believe to be wise and good, and giving liberty of choice and action to someone else to do it or let it alone. God gives us a measure of free will, but He is not responsible for our use or abuse of it. The State tolerates the followers of Joanna Southcote, but is not accountable for their vagaries. So it is one thing to say, Ireland ought to govern itself in its own way, though we know it will not be our way, and quite another to say, We will deliberately give to Ireland, because a large section of its people want it, a University system which is opposed to our own convictions of justice and religious equality. So long as Ireland is ruled in its national affairs by a British Parliament, so long must the members of that Parliament have first regard to the principles which they believe to be sound and true, and only yield to local sentiment when to do so is consistent with fidelity to conviction. If the working out of this principle tells harshly against Ireland or any other constituent part of the United Kingdom, let him who sees the fact, mark, learn, and inwardly digest.

Personally I have no liking for a vitiated "atmosphere" such as that which is suggested for each of the two projected Universities. It is said that the one in Dublin would be a University for Roman Catholics, but not a Roman Catholic University. It is a distinction without a difference in practical operation. The controlling body would be Catholic, the professoriate would be Catholic, the tone would be Catholic all through, and, inevitably, the students, almost or altogether without exception, would be Catholic. And this is the desire of the priesthood at any rate—not so much the desire of the laity. Many of them would gladly go to Trinity College, Dublin, or to the Queen's Colleges, at Belfast, Cork, and Galway; but the ecclesiastical authorities ban all these institutions as deadly—Trinity College, because it is Protestant; the Queen's Colleges, because they are "godless." Some Catholic laymen have the courage to incur the displeasure of the Church and send their sons to one of these colleges, and then we see men like Lord Russell of Killowen, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and Mr. J. J. Clancy emerge with distinction from the dreaded University training without any harm done to their Catholic convictions.

The plea for a Catholic University is in sharp contradistinction to the glorification of the aims of the "United Irishmen" in the celebrations last year. Their great aim was to break down the barriers dividing sects and parties as far as possible, and bring together in harmonious unity Catholics and Protestants, teaching them to work side by side and allow in all friendliness and toleration for differences of conviction. What would be the result of having three Universities in Ireland—one with a Catholic atmosphere, another with an Episcopalian atmosphere, and a third with a Presbyterian atmosphere? Would it not be to accentuate and emphasise the differences which are only too marked already? One would think that the best efforts of wise statesmanship should be directed to bringing together the divided elements of that unhappy country, instead of marking them off and labelling them in separate packets. Widen the scope of the present Dublin University, by all means, and take away all that constitutes its remaining reproach as regards aggressive Protestantism; establish a new teaching University, if you will, on the broadest possible basis (and you will find it hard to improve on the good old Queen's University so ruthlessly and unjustly destroyed twenty years ago to please the Catholics); affiliate to one of these Universities any colleges, whether Catholic or secular or whatever they may be, which show a sufficiently high standard of education or promise of reaching it; but do not add to the miseries of Ireland and bequeath the burdensome legacies to your successors by reviving the sectarian spirit which was so effectively checked and weakened when theological tests were abolished at Trinity College and the Protestant Episcopal Church was disestablished in Ireland.

With your permission I will continue the consideration of this crucial subject next week. C. J. STREET.

A TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

SIR,—I think that Mr. Travers Herford shows some misconception of the real purport of the letters addressed to you by Mr. W. Harrison and myself on this subject.

You, Sir, mentioned in one of the "Notes of the Week" that the idea of a fund to commemorate the commencement of the twentieth century had been suggested for the purpose of providing means for building new churches, and you asked for suggestions. My own part in it was simply to suggest another, and, as I considered, a preferable or more urgent, use for this fund.

There is no originality, I am quite aware, in the idea of a twentieth century fund. Most people who think about it will feel drawn to attempt some new unselfish endeavour at such a period, just as most of us feel at the New Year, even more than at other times, the desire for better things. It is to the credit of the Wesleyans that they were the first to turn into a practical form those resolves and aspirations. Because their effort is already a wonderful success, is that any reason why we, too, should not have our more modest but not less important fund?

"Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works."

Mr. Herford says the proposal is prompted by "a desire for rivalry, hampered by the want of a respectable pretext."

Will he be good enough to say if, in his opinion, it is well that any considerable number of men, filling the responsible positions of ministers of congregations, with all the calls upon them which such a position involves, should be existing on stipends varying from £90 to £150 a year; whether it is not a fact that in large numbers of other instances where the salaries are of larger amounts than these, the usefulness and power for good of a minister is seriously hampered by the constant anxiety for the future of his family and the worry of enforced economies; and, lastly, whether the number of students at the two principal training colleges is a satisfactory use of the great advantages offered there?

If the answers to these questions are not satisfactory, and I do not see how they can be so, then there is not only a respectable pretext, there is a deep and urgent need. At the meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association at Southport, Mr. Charles W. Jones said he thought that the ministers should live not only in comfort, but also in luxury if possible.

With respect to the London Bazaar, I have no desire to suggest anything which would in any way interfere with the success of this effort, with which I most cordially sympathise; but I do not think that a fund of, say, £100,000, or even £128,000, which is the extreme that I suggested, to be raised eighteen months later, would interfere with this excellent work. To those who intend to support it, I would only say: "This also ye ought to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

RICHARD ROBINSON.

Birkenhead, Feb. 4.

WE have also received a further note on this subject from the Rev. William Harrison, re-affirming his position, and urging that we need not be ashamed to learn from the Wesleyans, since "Unitarian reasonableness and Methodist fervour make a splendid blend." The larger fund, should it be inaugurated, would not, in his view, interfere with the London Bazaar, and such a self-denying effort would not injure, but strengthen local funds.

SUMMER SCHOOL FOR TEACHERS AT OXFORD.

SIR,—I trust that the proposed summer school at Oxford for teachers will be carried into effect. I am sure there are many teachers who would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded of increasing their knowledge of the philosophy of religion and the art and practice of teaching. Such a school could not fail to bear fruit in stimulating and increasing enthusiasm for the work.

It would be well if the necessary arrangements were made as early as possible, and the dates fixed so that teachers could arrange their holidays accordingly. S. CLEMENT RILEY.

THE NONCONFORMISTS MARRIAGE ACT.

SIR,—Some months ago I received from the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a note, asking if it was the intention of the trustees or governing body of Upper Chapel to adopt the new Marriage Act. I replied that it was possible that they would do so, but that nothing was definitely fixed. Since then the trustees and committee have adopted the Act, and appointed me the "authorised person" to act in lieu of the Registrar. But I find myself compelled to decline to act in this capacity. I am unwilling to incur legal responsibilities and make myself liable to pains and penalties (§ 12) for duties for which another man is paid. Under the pretence of removing an annoyance the Act adroitly imposes the Registrar's duties upon the "authorised person," and for ten years to come the Registrar is to receive fees for each marriage.

The truth is, the Act is no concession to Nonconformists, though passed ostensibly with that end in view. I do not find that laymen are willing to act as "authorised person." It is hardly to be expected they should be. Few men can leave their business to be present gratuitously—or, rather, for the magnificent sum of sixpence (§ 11-2)—at each marriage, and undertake the onerous duties of Registrar into the bargain. There are many inconveniences incident to the minister's appointment as "authorised person," notably the fact that if he should happen to be away from home at the time appointed for a marriage, he must apply to "the authorised person of some registered building in the same registration district" (§ 6-4), or, as a last resort, go to the Registrar.

I think it likely that others of our ministers may be appointed by their committees to act as "authorised person," and it would be well if you would open your columns for the free expression of opinion on this subject.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

SIR,—The excursion to Grindelwald in 1897 was such a success, and so many regrets have been expressed by those who could not take part in it, and so many have wished to go again, that the Committee have determined to arrange a similar one this year, again to Grindelwald. £7 will cover all expense of the return journey, and a fortnight's board and lodging. Most of the excursions can be made on foot, and glorious walks taken into the heart of the glacier and snow region. Mr. Shrubsole, the well-known lecturer, geologist and botanist, has kindly undertaken to be with us at Grindelwald again this year.

Those who have not been before should make early application, to secure accommodation, to Miss F. Hill, Summer Excursions, 13, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, N.W.

HYMNS FOR HEART AND VOICE.

SIR,—I think it is worth while to call attention to part of Hymn 70 in this collection. It reads thus:—

"In joy we now approach Him,
In hope we kneel and pray,
For He whose love redeems us
Will wash our sins away."

The name of Lawrence Tuttiett is appended to this; but does it not appear by inadvertence in a book issuing from Essex Hall? JENNETT HUMPHREYS.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co., Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London."

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held at Southport on Thursday evening, Feb. 2, in the schoolroom of the Portland-street Unitarian Church. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. JOSEPH COVENTRY, who was supported by the Revs. Charles Hargrove, Dr. Klein, C. H. Wellbeloved, W. H. Drummond, J. C. Hirst, Joseph Harrison (representing the N. and E. Lancashire Mission), J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Messrs. Charles W. Jones, A. S. Thew, and B. P. Burroughs (secretary). There was a large attendance. Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who was to have been present, had been unexpectedly called to London, but sent his heartiest wishes for a successful gathering.

The Report, having referred to the loss sustained in the death of Mr. James Thornely, who was a member of the first Committee of the Association, dwelt upon the satisfactory nature of the work done by the Rev. R. S. Redfern at Crewe, the Rev. H. W. Hawkes at Bootle, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas at Liscard. It also included a letter from the Rev. J. L. Haigh concerning the work of the Hamilton-road Mission. Mr. Haigh reported most encouraging activities throughout the week, and an average attendance on Sunday of 52 in the morning and 106 in the evening. At Garston services were being continued by laymen, attendance was increasing, and it was hoped soon to start a Sunday-school. A course of lectures was arranged to be held in the Walton County Hall.

In his report from Crewe, Mr. Redfern noted a slightly better average attendance at the services, and also in the amount of the offertories, and expressed the satisfaction of the congregation in the receipt of a legacy of £1,000 from the late Philip Barker, of Nantwich, strengthening their financial position.

From Bootle Mr. Hawkes reported that while he had been obliged to be away for a considerable part of the year through ill-health, the work of the church had been loyally maintained; for five months the morning service had been conducted almost entirely by two members of the congregation. The average attendance at morning service had been 63, as compared with 53 of the previous year, and the evening attendance 125, as against 128.

From Liscard Mr. Thomas reported an unavoidable dislocation of week-night activities, during the erection of the new church, but satisfactory progress in membership and attendance. The roll of subscribing members numbered 81, and the attendance at service had averaged 53 in the morning and 73 in the evening. It was hoped that the new church and school buildings would be opened before summer was over.

The Treasurer's statement showed an income of £421 14s. 7d., including subscriptions £226 5s. and chapel collections £112 19s. 1d. The grants to Crewe, Liscard, Bootle, and Hamilton-road amounted to £340; the balance of expenses of Garston and St. Helens services was £20 18s. 1d. There remained in hand a balance of £48 10s. 5d.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report of the Committee and the treasurer's statement of accounts, said the last year's work of the Association had been marked by fresh activity, through the promotion of services at St. Helens and Garston. He thought the case of Garston was one of great encouragement both to the whole district and to the place itself. A short time ago there were but ten persons meeting together there, while at present that number had increased to thirty. It was gratifying in the extreme to find their work growing to such an extent at their branches, and it was therefore with the greatest possible pleasure that he moved the resolution.

The Rev. Dr. KLEIN seconded, remarking that he considered it an admirable decision of the Committee to hold their annual meetings in rotation at different places, and he was glad that they had commenced at Southport, where the large gathering that night might be taken as an augury of future success in other places. He congratulated the Association on the success which had followed their labours at Bootle, which place he considered had set an example to them all. He addressed himself at length to the great want they experienced of suitable Sunday-school teachers. They wanted more and they wanted a better quality of teacher than they were able to find, as they were not trained for the purpose. It was a subject they could not leave alone. He asked all those who heard him to try and do something themselves, and remember that they would be taking up the most solemn call which could fall upon a human soul.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, whom the Chairman described as the guest of the evening, then proposed the following resolution:—

That, in receiving the reports of the Revs. R. Stuart Redfern, H. W. Hawkes, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas, from Crewe, Bootle, and Liscard respectively, the members of this Association record their sense of the great importance of the work, for the support of which they are themselves largely responsible, and their earnest sympathy with those who are practically engaged in these efforts to extend the influence of a liberal religious faith and life.

I am asked, he said, to move a resolution which expresses "our sense of the great importance of the work of the Association" and "our earnest sympathy with those who are engaged in it." I do not suppose there would be any difference among those who call themselves, or who are called, Unitarians, as to the latter part of the resolution. We all of us sympathise with our brethren who are charged with the arduous, and often discouraging, duty of founding new Churches of the liberal faith, in districts where everybody, except the handful of supporters, cordially and conscientiously desire their failure. In the old Churches we have a long tradition to support us in hours of doubts or difficulty; we know that the good ship which has outlived the rough weather of two hundred years, and never known what it was to sail under unclouded skies and with favourable winds, is yet staunch and seaworthy, and won't go down because of a squall just now. And those who belong to influential and important congregations find plenty of consolation for their exclusion from the communion of other Churches in the consciousness that they are doing God's work, and none can hinder them. But ministers who are trying to form a congregation where the Unitarian name is unknown—or known only to be dreaded, and those who dare join themselves to him and avow beliefs which are scorned by the "superior" people, and proclaim disbeliefs which affright the pious, these men are deserving of the sympathy of us all, and I am sure, in the name of this meeting, I may heartily tender it to the ministers and congregations of Crewe, Bootle, and Liscard, and Hamilton-road. But are we equally agreed as to the importance of the work? If our laity in general were convinced of it, I am sure there would be much ampler support forthcoming for our missionary societies. For what they do believe in they support with a generosity which is acknowledged by those most opposed to us. All kinds of philanthropic effort, domestic missions to the poor of our great cities, the needs of their own place of worship—these are appeals to which we are sure of a ready and liberal response. The difficulty to raise funds among us is thus felt when the object is to extend our boundaries, and make our faith known where it has not been heard before. The only reason I can suggest for this is that the work does not commend itself to our laity in general as very desirable or effective. Is it any use, they ask themselves, to try to change peoples' religious beliefs and dissuade them from faith in the Trinity and Incarnation and Infallible Bible? What harm do these mistaken beliefs do them; or, rather, is it not certain that they do them much good, which might be lost altogether in losing them? I will not now discuss this interesting and important question. I confess, for my own part, I should be very slow to try to unsettle any man or woman in the faith by which they lived. And yet, truth is worth some risk, even of doing harm. Error is injury to men's souls—and should fear of greater injury prevent our doing our best to free them? But we may really neglect this scruple, which I have no doubt does hinder our work, because as a fact it is seldom we address ourselves to such as these convinced and unquestioning Trinitarians. Those who come to hear us for the first time are the doubters, the seekers, the men anxious for light and unable to rest and find peace for soul and intellect in the old creeds. Can it be a question whether or not we have a duty towards such as these? We profess that ours is a faith in full accord with reason and conscience. Dare we withhold it from those who are in search of just such a faith, or who have abandoned the search in despair? In every place are some such, and we should do what we can for them. Ay, but what can we do? they go on to ask, our high-minded Unitarian laity, who are always ready to do what is practicable, but much too wise to spend money and effort for what doesn't profit. Are our churches in general, and our mission settlements in especial—"with a score or so of exceptions"—miserable failures? Is it a right impression which one has formed of the Provincial Reports which appeared last year in the pages of THE INQUIRER, that they are "the most gruesome story he ever read"? Well, I have no wish to shirk the question, and I have often been found fault with before now because I have been determined to face "the facts of the case," and resolutely refused "to gloss them over." At the same time I should like, as one deeply interested in the Unitarian cause, that the case should be heard in camera. It is not, so far as I have had experience, the way of any Church or institution to proclaim its failure before the world, unless it be in order to justify a proposal of dissolution. If we are in so ill a plight let us take counsel together what is wrong with us, and see what we can do to regain prosperity; but let us not aggravate failure and hasten ruin by discouraging all our supporters, and warning off all who may be inclined to join us. For my part, however, I am not disposed for one hour to give place to lamentation and despair. I am quite ready to face the question of Unitarian success or failure, only I ask that we shall first agree by what tests it is to be tried. Now there are two tests very easy of application—the financial and the numerical. And I am bound at once to confess that, tried by either of these ordinary tests, we are a lamentable, a monstrous, failure as compared with other Churches. I do not suppose we have more than 70,000 sittings in all our English chapels. The Congregationalists have more than twenty times that number. It would be much if we were to assume that there were 30,000 who might be called "members," regular attendants at our services and contributors to our funds. The Salvation Army has just that number of "officers"—i.e., ministers and lay-preachers, and active workers. The Baptists have 360,000 members. But I will not pursue the matter further, nor will I humble myself and you by comparison of the balance-sheets of other religious societies and our own. I utterly and absolutely disclaim these tests as applied to ourselves, otherwise I would as quickly as possible turn my back on a Church which is tried by them and convicted of ignominious and utter failure. We ministers are all glad of large congregations; our baser and better nature are alike gratified when we preach to a full church; but it is rarely we do so—rarely, if ever, that we can look round and not mark many an empty seat. And we all, for the meanest reasons and the noblest, like to know that the money is coming in freely to every fund we are interested in: it doesn't, and we feel the reproach of one who left us "that the balance-sheets of our Mission societies are like petty cash accounts." Very well; we boldly face the facts. We could wish them otherwise, but wishing is no good, and grumbling and scolding is still less. If wishing would do it, all England should be Unitarian, and in our glorious cathedrals, and every parish church, and all chapels, and humblest meeting houses should be fulfilled the prophecy of a great Liverpool Unitarian and the time have come

When from vast cathedral pile
When from far off coral isle,
Rises one united prayer
Ringing through the singing air
And that prayer—the same—the one,
"To the Father—through the Son."

It may be so in ten thousand years; it will not be in our day, and we must take things as they are, and do our best, and bide God's time. But what, then, is the test, you ask, by which we are to be tried? My friends, I know one and one only by which to try all causes. Financially and numerically the greatest success of this century has undoubtedly been Mormonism. And why do we not all become Mormons? Because this very successful creed is not truth. Yes, the one test of every religion is—its truth. Do you believe in Unitarianism? Then stand to it, if you are left its solitary representative; preach it if you can by any means get two or three to hear. If it be not true, may God convert us, or, at least, confound our attempts at making converts. But if it be true, let us be proud and glad to own it. Minorities are not always right, but majorities are almost always wrong. We have endless difficulties and discouragements to contend with. Let us take heart of grace. If truth is on our side, it is well: it is glorious to work for it: it is glorious even to fail in her service.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES seconded, in a speech which was directed to the question of finances in their Church, making a strong appeal to the congregations to see that they kept their ministry up to a proper standard pecuniarily, otherwise they could not expect to supply to the Church those learned and cultured men who were necessary to lead them. Fathers having sons of education and capacity would not dare to ask them to enter the ministry when the emoluments were so far below what they could secure in other professions.

The resolution having been carried, the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, as the latest recruit in the service, responded.

On the motion of the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, seconded by the Rev. J. C. HIRST, the committee was appointed, and a vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. J. HARRISON, and seconded by Mr. THEW, concluded the business of the meeting.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held in the church on Friday evening, Feb. 3. Mr. T. W. Ryland presided, and was supported by the Rev. L. P. Jacks and others. There was a good attendance. The Vestry Committee, in their report for the past year, said the exact date of the opening of the first meeting-house, in Meeting House-yard, was not known, but the evidence extant showed that it must have been in or about the year 1692. It was not often that an institution allowed a bicentenary to pass unheeded, but in their case the second century was concluded towards the end of Dr. Crosskey's life, when their anxiety for him prevented their celebrating what would otherwise undoubtedly have been a marked period. It was curious that the fact had not been alluded to in any of the reports, and the committee thought the event was of sufficient importance to have a permanent place in the records of the church. The most important event of the year in the life of the church had been the introduction of a series of liturgical services in the place of the old free services. This had rendered necessary the removal of the choir to seats downstairs, and they recommended that this arrangement should be permanent. They had, however, been obliged to abandon the idea of removing the organ from the gallery to the floor. The electric-lighting of the church was recommended. The statement of accounts did not show a deficiency. At the end of last year there was a balance on the wrong side of £110, but the late treasurer (Mr. New) collected a sufficient sum to wipe off the debt. Omitting the amount thus collected, the income had been £1,108 17s. 8d., against £1,075 13s. 5d., while the expenses had been £1,108 4s. 1d., against £1,118 5s. 11d. last year. The report was adopted on the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. H. Hendriks. An appreciative reference was made by Mr. Priestley Smith to the "Six Orders of United Worship," prepared by Mr. Jacks for the use of the congregation. On the motion of Mr. E. Taylor, seconded by Mr. L. Hughes, it was agreed:—"That the congregation of the Church of the Messiah desire to express to the Rev. L. P. Jacks their continued sympathy with him in the work of the church, and to tender to him and to Mrs. Jacks their most grateful thanks for the energy and devotion with which they have helped forward that work, and to assure them of their hearty friendship and goodwill." The officers and Vestry Committee were thanked for their services, and Mr. P. J. Worsley was requested to act as warden for the next two years. It was also decided to raise a special fund to provide choir stalls near the pulpit, and for the cleaning of the church and the installation of electric-light. On Sunday the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached at the morning service.

Birmingham: Newhall Hill.—Last Sunday morning after the sermon the Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth referred to the loss sustained by the religious life of the country in the death of the Rev. Dr. Berry, of Wolverhampton, and the congregation requested Mr. Charlesworth to convey to Dr. Berry's congregation their deep sympathy with them in their bereavement.

Brighton.—On Tuesday, Feb. 7, the annual meeting of the members and friends of the Free Christian Church took place in the Lecture Hall, New-road, when there was a large attendance. The report shows heavier losses than usual by death and removal; but, on the other hand, several new members have joined the congregation. In the report the general expenses fund shows a balance due to the treasurer; but, since it was printed, subscriptions, due last year, have been paid, and all liabilities are fully covered. Since the report was printed there has also been a considerable increase in the number of children in the Sunday-school; and now our chief need is for a like increase in the number of our teachers. After the more formal part of the business was concluded the meeting partook of a social character, several friends contributing by music and recitations to the enjoyment of the evening.

Burnley (Resignation).—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith has resigned the pulpit of the Trafalgar-street Church, and will terminate his ministry at the end of April.

Bury.—At the distribution of prizes in the Bank-street Sunday-school on Sunday, Jan. 22, first class prizes (no late or absent marks) were given to 44 girls and 51 boys. Gold medals were awarded to one girl and one boy for ten years' unbroken punctuality, and silver medals for five years to six girls and three boys. A further silver medal (subscribed for by the teachers) was given to another boy, who had been absent once, in his fifth year, through illness.

Cardiff: West Grove Church.—The annual general meeting of the congregation was held, after the evening service, on Sunday last, Feb. 5. There was a good attendance, and Mr. George Carslake Thompson presided. The annual report and accounts were adopted. The report bore testimony to the appreciation, on the part of the congregation, of the services of the new minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A.; also to the fact that the attendances at the Sunday services had very much improved, and that all the institutions of the church had been restarted upon a sound basis. Mr. George Carslake Thompson was elected president of the congregation, and Mr. W. A. Moore was appointed delegate to the South East Wales Unitarian Society. Mr. Charles Mogridge was appointed secretary, and Mr. F. Johns was re-elected treasurer. A vote of thanks was passed to the retiring secretary (Mr. W. A. Moore) for his services, as secretary, during the past five years.

Chowbent.—The Rev. J. J. Wright, chiefly known outside our own churches for considerable literary service in connection with the National Home Reading Union, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature of the United Kingdom, of which the Earl of Halsbury, the Lord Chancellor, is president. The Atherton newspapers of last week report the fact with cordial local congratulations.

Eastbourne.—Miss A. E. Bayly ("Edna Lyall") has been organising a requisition to the Mayor and a memorial to the Tsar on the subject of the Peace Conference, and sent copies to all the clergy and ministers of religion in the town on Sunday week, that they might obtain signatures. As there is no settled minister of the Unitarian Congregation, she sent the papers to Miss E. W. Burkitt, and a further note of cordial thanks acknowledging the signatures obtained.

Elland.—On Saturday last the annual congregational meeting was held in the schoolroom. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. James Taylor, who gave a short address on the future prospects of the church. Mr. A. Whitworth, of Huddersfield, and Mr. E. B. Stott and Henry Dyson, of Halifax, gave short addresses of encouragement. Reports were read by Messrs. W. R. Briggs and R. H. Fletcher on the work done during the past year.

Garston.—On Tuesday week a social meeting of those interested in the Unitarian services which were commenced about a year ago, and have latterly been continued chiefly by laymen, was held in the Co-operative Hall. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. Dr. Klein, who was supported by Mr. J. Coventry, president of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, Mr. E. P. Burroughs, secretary of the association, and others. The Chairman, in his address, congratulated the friends at Garston on the success which had attended their efforts, and said it was a good sign that the laymen were anxious to help. It was well for the ministers to do their duty, but it was better to see the spirit running over until the laymen were imbued with the desire to do their part also. In an age when priesthood was trying to re-assert itself it was a particularly good omen to see laymen taking such an active part in religious work. Mr. William Bowring, who was to have presided, but had been delayed, subsequently arrived and, having taken the chair, expressed his interest in the movement. Mr. Coventry joined with the preceding speakers in urging the importance of establishing a Sunday-school. Refreshments and a musical programme added to the pleasure of the evening.

Ilford.—A series of lectures will be delivered in the Central Hall of the Board-schools, Cleveland-road, commencing on Thursday evening next at eight o'clock. In this rapidly-growing town it has been felt for some time that an effort should be made to spread the knowledge of the Gospel we have to preach as Unitarians. The Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties has made arrangements for the delivery of lectures on Thursday evenings—Feb. 16, 23; March 2 and 9. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will give the first, "The Message of Unitarianism to the Present Age." The Rev. H. Woods Perris and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards will continue the series. It is hoped that friends in the neighbourhood will help by their presence and influence to make the effort a success.

Ilkeston.—On Sunday, Jan. 29, there was an exchange of pulpits in the evening among the Nonconformists of the town, and the Rev. E. A. Maley preached at the United Methodist Free Church. His pulpit should have been occupied by the student who was supplying the Wesleyan Church; but at the last moment the principal of Handsworth College would not allow it, as being unfair to a young and inexperienced man to place him in so difficult a position. The Children's Guild was recently delighted by a lecture by Mr. Harrop White, of Mansfield, on the "Engadine," with lantern views.

King's Lynn.—A successful bazaar was held on Jan. 25 and 26 to raise £100 for the painting and cleaning of the church, repairing the organ, &c. The bazaar was opened by the Mayor, and other friends belonging to other denominations had given cordial help. The Rev. F. T. Simmonds was present, and offered prayer, after which the Rev. G. Lansdown, minister of the church, stated the object of the bazaar. The total receipts amounted to £60.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held last Sunday after the morning service, Mr. Philip H. Holt in the chair. Regret was expressed at the retirement of Mr. R. C. Hall, on account of failing health, from the chairmanship, which he has held for a number of years. It was reported that, owing to the disturbance from the new electric trams double windows had been put into the chapel, and the electric light was also being introduced. A letter from the Rev. W. J. Jupp to Mr. B. P. Burroughs, secretary of the congregation, was read. Mr. Jupp wrote, after the completion of the first year of his ministry at the chapel, expressing gratitude for the growing ties which united him to the congregation and for the progress made. In the course of the letter, he said:—"For any signs, however few and small, of growing prosperity we may rejoice together in quiet gladness of heart. And we will remind each other that any increase in numbers or material support can be reckoned as gain only as it becomes a means to that true increase of life—that real prosperity of the spirit, without which all other progress is but a vain and transient good. We must needs keep well before us the thought of that for which we stand, and be careful to cherish that temper of soul wherewith to stand for it wisely and well. For even as a tree is known by its fruits, so is a congregation, however small, known by its moral influence and its religious power. This great and precious heritage of liberty which is ours—of liberty in things of highest moment to mankind—has its obligations. Freedom in religion is a great trust; the more so seeing that so few, comparatively, have yet attained thereto. We dare not forget that "the price of liberty is eternal vigilance": which means that it is required of us to watch for the ever fresh unfoldings of divine truth in human life, and to follow with unwearied steps the path on which that truth may shine, and to do the work to which it calls with resolute will and uncompromising hearts."

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, after an absence of four months on account of ill-health, has returned to work, and during the present month is preaching at morning service. In the Calendar he acknowledges the gift of a new pulpit gown from a number of friends. During January a falling-off in the attendance at the Band of Hope is reported, due to unfavourable weather, the average having been only 158. The Secretary of the Hope-street Jubilee Bazaar writes:—"All things come to him who waits, including disappointment. Do not wait any longer, but, if you have not already done so, begin to work in your own special way for the bazaar. Many men, many minds; but see that you do mind in some way or other. Don't overlook the fitting occasion on which to remind your friends that they have here an opportunity of showing their friendliness. Collect curios or pence—both will be useful at the bazaar. The Sub-Committees have now been constituted, and a preliminary Bazaar circular will shortly be issued."

London: Blackfriars Provident Bank.—The accounts for the year 1898 show that there were 1,077 depositors; that these people deposited 21,035 separate sums, amounting in all for the year to £674 8s. 3d. This is the highest record reached since the establishment of the Provident Bank in 1886. The depositors receive a visit from the lady collectors every Monday morning. The Rev. F. Allen, minister and missionary, attends at Stamford-street Chapel to meet the visitors and receive the sums of money collected by each.

London: Islington.—The report of the committee of Unity Church, adopted at the annual meeting on Jan. 25, referred with satisfaction to the progress made during the past year. The treasurer had commenced with an adverse balance of £12, which was almost completely wiped out. The completion of the first year of Dr. Hicks's ministry was marked by signs of renewed interest in the services, and the report referred to the attendance of Dr. Martineau on Sunday mornings.

London: Peckham.—The annual Sunday-school meeting was held on Monday, when the usual programme of tea, games, and singing and recitations by scholars, was gone through, after which the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Bredall and Mr. Cecil Griffin. Short and interesting addresses were given by Mr. W. R. Marshall (school secretary), Mr. W. J. Cooley (church secretary), and the Rev. G. Carter, who presided, and specially alluded to the admirable behaviour and sweet singing of the scholars.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Saturday, Jan. 28, the annual congregational party was held in the Public Hall. After tea the Rev. W. E. Atack took the chair, and spoke of the progress of the work. Short addresses were also given by Revs. Dendy Agate, Alex. Gordon, and J. Ruddle and local friends. The annual report was read by Mr. W. Mort, secretary, and showed a very gratifying and encouraging result of the year's working. A sale of work was organised by the ladies and realised a considerable sum.

Mansfield.—The Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., preached at the Old Meeting on Sunday week, and on the following Monday evening lectured to the Social Union on "Rome," when a number of beautiful photographs of the city, given by Miss Dorothea Hollins to the congregation, were shown for the first time, helping to illustrate the lecture. The Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., began last Sunday evening a course of lectures on "What we owe to the Sects," his subject being "The Roman Catholics." On succeeding Sundays the Anglicans, Wesleyans, Congregationalists, Quakers and Unitarians are to be dealt with in turn. Of a recent successful town's meeting on the subject of "The Tsar's Manifesto," Mr. Perris, with the Rev. W. G. Cruft, was hon. secretary.

Mossley.—The annual sale of work, got up by the sewing society, with the assistance of the sewing class, took place on Saturday last, and was opened at 3 P.M. by Mr. A. Morrell, one of the superintendents, who has been actively connected with the movement for nearly forty years. The sale was one of the most successful ever held, the receipts amounting to £75 12s. 6d.

Norwich (Resignation).—The Rev. E. M. Daplyn has resigned the pulpit of the Octagon Chapel, which he has occupied since 1896. The resignation takes effect at Midsummer.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The annual business meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening last for the purpose of receiving the reports of committees, treasurer's statements of accounts, and election of officers for the ensuing year. A copy of the February Calendar, which contains reports of the committees and the various institutions of the church, shows that excellent work is being done, and that all the agencies are in a healthy condition. In the absence of the treasurer (Mr. J. B. Wostinholm), the chair was occupied by Mr. W. Guest, who congratulated the congregation on the satisfactory state of the finances, and proposed, on behalf of the committee, that a sum of £20 from the balance in hand on the treasurer's account be handed to the minister as a supplement to his salary. This was carried unanimously. Statements were made by Mr. H. F. Waldron on behalf of the fellowship fund, and by Messrs. R. Handley and F. Blackwell on behalf of the Sunday-school. The retiring members of the committee were re-elected.

Cordial votes of thanks were passed to various church officers, and to the organist and choir for their services. A vote of thanks in appreciation of the good work done by the minister and his wife was most warmly received. The Rev. John Ellis, in responding, said he was much encouraged by that expression of the continued confidence of his people. Although they had not made the progress as a congregation that he desired to see, nevertheless he was satisfied that all good effort, though the results may not be immediately seen, would bear fruit. He referred to the severe losses their church had sustained, especially by the deaths of Mr. Charles Woolien and Miss Hobson, and said that it would require a large accession of devoted members to fill the vacancies thus left. The fine spirit which animated the members of the Young People's Religious Union filled him with hopefulness for the future. In conclusion he asked those present to consecrate themselves afresh to truth, to religion, to service—thus would they spread the light and influence others by the expression in their lives of their undogmatic Christian Faith. A vote of thanks to Mr. Guest for presiding terminated a most interesting and harmonious meeting.

Swansea.—The services for the past two Sundays have been conducted by the Rev. W. T. Jones, until recently a highly reputed minister in the Calvinistic Methodist body. On Jan. 29 (his first appearance in a Unitarian pulpit) he preached on "The Necessity of Religion," and in the evening on "The Value of Life," and on Feb. 5 on "The Moral Life" and "The Drift of the Age towards Truth." His discourses were marked by all the fervour that characterises Welsh Nonconformity, aided by the free atmosphere of Unitarianism, and were listened to by attentive and increasing congregations.

Swinton.—On Wednesday evening, Jan. 25, Mr. Arthur Evans entertained the teachers and officers of the Sunday-school and some other friends, about fifty in all, to tea in the School-room. In the course of the evening the chair was taken by Mr. H. Pearson, a former superintendent, and speeches were made congratulating Mr. Evans on completing his twenty-fifth year in the school.

Taxistock.—The Rev. John Barron preached last Sunday evening on the Evangelical Free Church Catechism, and said that, taking an unprejudiced view of the matter, the Evangelical Free Churches were to be congratulated on the result which had been arrived at in formulating a common ground of belief.

Urmston.—The Sunday-school tea party was held on Friday week. At the evening's entertainment the chair was taken by the Rev. Dendy Agate, and the secretary read a satisfactory annual report. Prizes for good attendance were given to fifteen of the children.

Walsall.—At a recent supper party of the congregation of the Unitarian Free Church, the Rev. Peter Dean gave an interesting address on "The Unitarians, Past and Present," which was fully reported in a local paper.

THE LIFE OF HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.,

Professor of English at University College, London.

BY

HENRY SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD. 1898. Price 12s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Speaker.—"Professor Morley, the author and lecturer, would be in any case a person worth reading about. Henry Morley, the man, large in heart and brain, is, perhaps, still more worthy of our attention. . . . Mr. Solly's 'Life' ought to be bought by public libraries, presented by rich men to ministers of religion, and read by all who love English morals and English literature."

The Athenæum.—"He Morley's life was busy and full of interest . . . a very successful if tested by the true tests of success. Morley won a unique position among the school teachers of our day."

The Academy.—"He . . . lets his subject speak for himself, in a diary, where these are available; but he has thought to the selection of his material, and the arrangement of it was to present a real portrait."

The Scotsman.—"An all-filled volume of some 400 pages . . . it will be welcomed among books of its class . . . those who would know the real worth of the man, much as he was known to his family, a reading of this excellent biography is indispensable."

Daily Chronicle.—"Not one man in a thousand would have won his way upward from such a quagmire of early troubles. . . . Mr. Solly has done his work well. This biography of his father-in-law is admirably written, in good taste, and with plenty of relief."

Daily Mail.—"An entirely satisfactory and eminently readable biography of a most lovable personality."

Manchester Guardian.—"There is always something fascinating to the student of human nature in the biography of a man who has in him the true instinct of the fighter, who begins life with tremendous odds against him, proceeds straightway to gird his loins for the fray, and after years of conflict emerges victorious. Henry Morley was essentially such a man."

Standard.—"The 'Life of Henry Morley' . . . has an interest of its own."

The Liverpool Post.—"Very well written."
Inquirer.—"This story of his life is sure of a most cordial welcome."

The Literary World.—"Mr. Solly has done his work well, and puts before us a strong and vivid portrait of a man of marked character, of considerable genius, and, above all, of indomitable pluck and perseverance. The story of Morley's struggles to make an income, and to break down the family opposition to his marriage with the woman of his choice, is reading of a very heartening sort."

Birmingham Post.—"The latter part of this biography, recording Professor Morley's work as a man of letters, is the more important; the former, detailing his fight with circumstances, is the more fascinating."

The Leeds Mercury.—"An admirable full-length portrait of a good man."

The Westminster Gazette.—"His life was well worth writing. . . . The personality revealed by his biographer is a singularly attractive one—generous, full of humour, the very soul of honour, 'a teacher of truth, of righteousness, and of love.' Mr. Solly shows admirable taste and discretion throughout his book."

Publishers' Circular.—"Among the countless students who have felt the influence of his teaching as lecturer and professor, the work is certain of a cordial welcome."

Isle of Wight County Press.—"To Mr. Solly nothing but the highest praise can be accorded for the manner in which he has accomplished his work; neither author nor editor, he has struck the happiest medium, and given us a volume which charms from its earliest pages, and in which the characters live and move before us right on to the end of the chapter."

Independent.—"Shows us how this well-equipped, self-sacrificing, and influential teacher was himself taught. Henry Morley won his wisdom by hard and bitter toil. The story of his life, as now set forth, is as interesting as were his methods of instruction; it will appeal to all whose happy privilege it was to be brought into direct contact with him, and to all who became acquainted with his work through the medium of the printed pages."

Daily News.—"Few memoirs more interesting have made their appearance in recent times."

Third Edition. Revised. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

PSALMS OF THE WEST.

"Many new and striking thoughts will be found in 'Psalms of the West.'"—Christian World.
"We have in this volume ninety Psalms of modern times containing innumerable beautiful sentiments."—Christian Life.

"There is in them a clear recognition of the discoveries made by Science, and of the paths still to be explored by her, our knowledge and our want of it."—Manchester Examiner.

"Very few, if any, books of modern 'scripture' approach the excellence of the little volume which bears the above title. . . . The author is deeply imbued with modern scientific conception of the universe, and he wisely makes them subserve his spiritual philosophy. He is a most sympathetic observer of men and nature. . . . His plea is for the unity of the spirit amid all the varieties of opinion. . . . We can unreservedly commend the volume to ministers who seek to enlarge their lectionary from modern writers, and the more meditative of our readers will be glad to have such a book for a quiet hour."—Inquirer.

SUSTENTATION FUND

For the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends.

The ANNUAL MEETING of the Contributors and Friends of this Fund was held at Dr. Williams's Library, London, on the 1st Feb., 1899. WM. LONG, Esq., President, in the Chair.

The Annual Report and Accounts were submitted to the Meeting, and letters from the Rev. R. Spears and the Rev. W. Blazeby, B.A., as to a certain grant made by the Board, were read, and the following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

1. That the Report and Accounts, as now read, be adopted and printed for circulation among the Contributors and Friends of the Fund.

2. That a respectful acknowledgment of their letters be forwarded to the Rev. Robert Spears and Rev. Wm. Blazeby, and that they be informed that the managers have always acted, to the best of their belief, in accordance with both the spirit and the letter of the constitution of this Fund, and the rules prescribed for its management, in the grants they have made for "the maintenance of faithful and efficient ministers to such Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations in the United Kingdom, as regularly assemble for the public worship of God."

3. That the retiring Managers, Messrs. David Ainsworth and Edgar Chatfield Clarke, whose term of office has expired, being duly nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers being produced, be and are hereby re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

4. That the sincere thanks of the Contributors be given to William Long, Esq., for his services as President during the past year, and that he be re-elected President for the year 1899.

5. That the thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Edgar Chatfield Clarke for his services as Honorary Treasurer during the past year, and that he be re-appointed Treasurer for the coming year.

6. That Messrs. Harry Rawson and A. W. Worthington be re-elected as Honorary Secretaries, with thanks for their services.

7. That the services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as Honorary Auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1899.

8. That the thanks of the Contributors be given to the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have courteously granted the use of rooms for the Meetings of the Fund during the past year.

9. That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the President for his services in the Chair.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, of whose work in Madras he himself gave us recently so interesting an account, has now left that city, and is settled for the present at Calcutta. The Madras papers spoke very warmly of the interest his visit had excited, and of the value of his lectures and addresses. Mr. Williams would reach Calcutta in time for the celebration of the sixty-ninth anniversary of the Brahma Somaj, which was to be held in the latter part of January.

THE Bishop of Gloucester on Friday week, on behalf of the Oxford and Cambridge University Presses, presented to Convocation two volumes of the Revised Version of the Bible, including the Apocrypha. The smaller volume was a copy of the edition with revised marginal references, the second volume was a large edition intended for use at the desk. The books were thankfully accepted by the Archbishop of Canterbury on behalf of the Upper House, and by the Prolocutor on behalf of the Lower House, and are to be deposited in the library of the Church House. This presentation was followed on the afternoon of the same day by the passing of a resolution in the Upper House, moved by the Bishop of Rochester and seconded by the Bishop of Salisbury, and unanimously adopted :—

That, in the opinion of this House, the use of the Revised Version of the Bible at the lectern in the public services of the Church, where this is desired by clergy and people, is not open to any well-founded objection, and will tend to promote a more intelligent knowledge of Holy Scripture.

A committee of the House had been appointed last year to consider the question, and this resolution was appended to their report.

THE general opinion of the Bishops who spoke was that the Revised Version could be used with advantage in church, only the change should be made not abruptly but gradually, and that it should not be forced where there was any unwillingness to receive it. One suggestion was that it might be used at the week-day services first, while the Authorised Version was still read on Sundays. This is already done in some churches, as also at the daily early morning service in Salisbury Cathedral. The Bishop of Salisbury, who seconded the resolution, said in his speech :—

I do not agree with a certain number of their readings and with a certain number of their renderings, but it seems to me that as a matter of conscience we ought to give the version a fair trial, and that the only way to try is, as has already been said, to read it in the services of the Church and thereby get the intelligent criticism of a large number of persons upon it, and to familiarise ourselves with its sound as well as with its sense. I believe that the result will be an increased appreciation of the rhythm of the version which has been very largely attacked and which, I believe, will be far better understood when it is constantly read aloud, and of the great help which it gives to the intelligent understanding of the sacred text itself.

It was pointed out that exactly the same objections as are now made to the Revised were made to the Authorised Version when it was first introduced in 1611. The change of rhythm, the manner of translation, and the use of unsuitable terms were all vehemently objected to, and the objections were long maintained. The Bishop of Winchester mentioned the great interest he had noticed both in primary and secondary schools, when the Revised and Authorised Versions printed in parallel columns had been given to the children as prizes. Other testimony to the great advantages of the Revised Version, and to the desire of many of the clergy for its introduction was given, so that the resolution of the Bishops is a good omen for the future.

The Puritan is the title of a new illustrated monthly magazine, of which the first number is issued for the present month. (James Bowden, Henrietta-street, W.C. 6d.) It is the new literary venture of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, and is hardly the substantial organ we had been led to expect. It certainly does not represent either the intellectual strength or the literary ability of the Evangelical Free Churches, but the slight papers, the personal and descriptive articles, and the pictures it contains, will no doubt find popular favour, and it will very likely pay better than a more serious magazine. We trust that many members of the Evangelical Free Churches are readers also of The New World, of which a notice will be found in another column. It is a purveyor of stronger meat to those who are occupied with the deeper problems of the spiritual life, and has had among its contributors such writers as Dr. Lyman Abbott, Professor W. F. Adeney, the Master of Balliol, Professor Cheyne, and Professor Pfeleiderer, of Berlin.

IN our last week's notice of the reviews we mentioned the remarkable article in the Contemporary on "The Sirdar's College at Khartoum." The writer, who has adopted the nom de plume of Paterfamilias, shows by his familiarity with the improvements effected of late in our elementary education—by his remarks on school-buildings, on the "forcing system," on the disastrous effects of examinations, on methods of teaching so as to form character even more than "train the mind"—that he has fully mastered the education question. And as Paterfamilias speaks with the authority of a man of wide and varied experience gathered in England, India, and Africa, his representations should, and no doubt will, receive the most sympathetic attention of Lord Cromer; and if the writer's views prevail, it may well happen that not only the Soudan, but India, and even England will be benefited by his wise and statesman-like counsels.

THE National Church Union of Scotland held its second annual conference at Edinburgh on Friday, Feb. 3, and the proceedings have been published in a new Scotch weekly, Saint Andrew. The Union is composed for the most part of Broad Churchmen, and several of the papers and speeches at the conference are an ample confirmation of the view that liberal theological opinions are making rapid progress in Scotland. In a discussion on the duty of the Church to the children, the Rev. J. Mitchell, B.D., of Mauchline, said that abstruse doctrines, like many of those in the Shorter Catechism, were utterly beyond the comprehension of children, and that he would not go further than "the great simple doctrines of the Fatherhood of God, the Forgiveness of Sins, and the Immortality of the Soul." The Rev. G. D. McNaughtan, B.D., of Ardoch, read an elaborate historical essay on "The Relation of the Church of Scotland to its Statutory Creed," with the object of showing that while the State in 1690 adopted the Confession of Faith as a Protestant document, there was no question of a formula or subscription. An attempt in 1693 to lay down a stricter formula was modified and virtually repealed in 1695, and liberty was restored; and it was the duty of the Church to-day to hold fast by the freedom to which they were entitled. A paper on "Unity" was read by the Rev. Patrick Stevenson, of Inverarity, in which the writer contended that the mind and soul must be free and fearless if there was to be any real unity among men; let the children of God's human family, he urged, live together in peace, springing from mutual respect, regard, and love. Professor Menzies, of St. Andrews, read an expository and critical paper on the accounts in the New Testament of the institution of the Lord's Supper, in which the conclusion is reached that no strict ritual is laid down, and that a large liberty of interpretation is permissible. The question of the significance of the Gospel miracles was discussed by the Rev. J. Murray, M.A., of Kilmalcolm, who held that either the belief or the disbelief in miracles is compatible with true Christianity. In view of the nature and character of these discussions, there seems no reason why the Unitarian ministers in Scotland should not be invited to attend the next annual conference.

At the annual meeting of the National Education Association held on Tuesday, Feb. 14, the report presented by the Committee was one of exceptional value and interest, and is well worth the careful study of all who take any part in the administration of our educational affairs. A careful review of the progress made during the last ten years is given; and it is noteworthy that, in spite of adverse Parliamentary majorities, and of clerical influence at Whitehall, the population of the country, under the jurisdiction of School Boards, has increased nearly 25 per cent. There were several able speeches by prominent leaders, including Lord Battersea, Lord E. Fitzmaurice, M.P., Sir John Brunner, M.P., Mr. C. Morley, M.P., Mr. Albert Spicer, M.P., and Mr. P. W. Bunting. The Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley made an eloquent plea for greater facilities for the training of teachers, without creed or test. The speakers were all in favour of universal School Boards covering suitable areas; and they held that until elementary education was properly organised, and rendered more efficient, the development of any good and adequate system of secondary education would prove a very difficult and unsatisfactory task.

Mr. GUY LEWIS, B.A. (Oxon), has been appointed headmaster of Willaston School (Barker Foundation). The school will be opened in September, 1900.

THE REV. R. SPEARS and Mrs. Spears wish to thank the many friends for their kind wishes and inquiries.

THE NEW NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGE ACT.

SIR.—The New Nonconformist Marriage Act which comes into operation in the month of April this year requires, as Mr. Manning pointed out in your columns last week, careful consideration on the part of congregations. In response to an application from the Registrar-General, circulars were forwarded to all the churches in England and Wales whose names appear in the "Essex Hall Year Book" for the current year, inquiring whether or not the congregation desired to take advantage of the Act. 142 congregations have replied in the affirmative, 59 in the negative, 34 were undecided, and 50 have so far sent no reply. A summary of the replies has been forwarded to the Registrar-General at Somerset House, along with a marked copy of the "Year Book."

The "Essex Hall Year Book for 1899" contains the principal sections of the Act, and also a lucid statement explanatory of its provisions by Dr. Tyssen. The solicitor of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Howard Young, has been consulted, and he points out that for congregations the essential features of the Act are:—

1. The appointment by the trustees or the "governing body" of the authorised person.

2. The absence of any provision declaring that a marriage actually solemnised shall be good notwithstanding any defects in form.

No definition is given in the Act of the expression "the trustees or other governing body" of the registered building, but these are the persons who have power to certify to the name and address of the person or persons authorised for the particular registered building. As Dr. Tyssen points out, the trustees of Unitarian chapels have usually no governing power, but simply hold the structure vested in them on certain trusts. Usually the affairs of the congregation are managed by a committee appointed by the congregation, and it would seem that this committee is the body specially indicated. But the Act is ambiguous, and having regard to the absence of the provision as to the validity of marriages above referred to, it would seem to be the safest course to have the authorised person appointed by (1) the trustees, (2) the congregation, and (3) by the committee, and then call upon the Registrar-General to supply the requisite marriage register, books and forms. That official has apparently no power to determine the validity or otherwise of an appointment.

The advantages of the Act are supposed to be (1) the raising of the status of Nonconformist ministers; (2) the saving of the attendance of the Registrar at Nonconformist marriages, and the occasional inconvenience caused by his appointments clashing; and (3) some saving in the fees.

The fees will first be reduced from 7s. to 6s., and then to 2s. at the end of ten years, or on there ceasing to be in the district a Registrar of Marriages appointed before the passing of the Act. The disadvantages to a congregation where marriages occur only occasionally apart from the point as to the uncertainty in the validity of marriages, are (1) the necessity for re-appointing the authorised person when changes of ministry take place (or in case of illness or absence of the minister, though it should be pointed out that the Act does not say that it is the minister who has to be appointed); (2) the necessity for a quarterly report as to marriages or absence of any celebrated during the quarter; and (3) the probable necessity for providing a safe or other place of security for the books.

It is very doubtful whether it will be wise for any small congregation to adopt the Act. The marriages at several chapels are so few, and the risk and trouble are so great, that it may be the wiser course in these cases to leave registration in the hands of the public official as at present.

FLOWERS OF THE FIELD.

Suggested by a Sermon of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke: "Consider the Lilies."

Not only those who toil with loving hand, Lending their mighty strength of heart and will

From off the weary shoulders of the land
To lift the burden of our human ill—

Not only these are blest. A blessing still Rests on the flower-lives, which, fair and bright,

Earth's darkest corners with their radiance fill.

They blossom silently, and scent the night
To cheer those toilers while they wait the coming light.

Take comfort, ye whose footsteps fate has bound

To falter feebly in a narrow space.

There's beauty in the simple daisy, found
Beside life's dusty highway. In its face

We see the love of God. By His good grace

There may grow up within a sad sick room
The glory of a gracious flower-place,

Where we forget the world's despair and gloom,

Inhale the peace that breathes around like sweet perfume.

And when our eyes gain clearer sight at length,

It may be we shall see these wayside flowers

Have been the secret of that noble strength
Which those fought with who strove

'gainst evil powers,
Who worked all through the scorching
noontide hours.

By such strong souls our bulwarks have been made,

But in the sod beneath their lofty towers
Lilies and violets bloom in fragrant shade,
And the great king of old was not like these arrayed.

FOR some time past several copies of the Christian Register have been forwarded to Essex Hall, and these copies have been distributed to ministers and others. For the information of those who desire to subscribe for the paper, we are asked to point out that the cheapest and most expeditious way is to order direct from Mr. G. H. Ellis, 272, Congress-street, Boston, U.S.A. The cost is two dollars, or 8s. 4d.

JEREMY TAYLOR, AND THE GOLDEN GROVE.—I.

ONE of the classics of English literature—at least in its religious expression—is a little book which was intended to serve but a temporary use, and yet which lives on, cherished as a precious thing by its possessors. Its title is a rich, suggestive one. A manual of prayers, and holy thoughts, and wise resolutions, it is called the “Golden Grove,” and in its very name seems to lead us into a calm and beautiful retreat, a walk beneath the trees whose leaves are golden with the sun that shines upon them. When afterwards we learn that the sweet name arose from a noble mansion in Wales, it is but natural that one still clings to the first impression, preferring that subtle odour of the tall avenue, the sun, the glowing leaves, the peacefulness. For, after all, these things were part of the life that Taylor lived in that Welsh home of his: they were beauties that existed all about him, and added their own magic of symbolism to the title he would choose for his book. That tiny volume (mine is only a third edition, 1656) would go out on its first venture into a world of strife and bitterness, an age of fiercer passions, perhaps, than England was ever again to know; and into this air of hot contesting, worldly scheming, and hatreds, would come a voice that called its hearers back to the secret dwelling-place of peace. Surely it was to invite men to a Golden Grove indeed.

He who sent forth the little book was one who had known strange chances and changes in life. He was no placid anchorite, self-exiled, choosing solitude, hating the world. He loved the world, with all it means for a keen and clever mind, and a large heart. He had used it, gained from it hours of delight, prized its honours, and was still ready again to enter its charmed circle. But all through its eager busy days, its hopes, realisations, disappointments, he had never forgotten that it is not the highest service of man. As courtier he had still remained a minister of God. And now from his enforced loneliness he could speak with the persuasion of one who has had experiences. It is only the deeply-versed scholar of the Christian life who has discovered, as Taylor says, that “there are many secrets of religion which are not perceived till they be felt”; so that when he speaks of the needful virtues of a true man, of the power that lies in deep religious convictions, or of the supreme helpfulness of reliance on God, this ex-chaplain of the court, this friend of the rulers of the Star Chamber and Court of High Commission, told of that which he knew. The comfort, the support, and the guidance of the faith and conduct he taught were the genuine experiences he himself had known. This, I believe, will strike everyone who reads the “Golden Grove,” remembering the chief events of Taylor’s life. The sincerity of the man, his full fount of devout life, are plainly shown in this simple volume, for we miss throughout the highly decorated style, the fanciful images, the exuberant, almost tropical, foliage of seventeenth-century words that distinguish, say, some of his sermons and most of his “Holy Living.” In the “Golden Grove” matter is everything, form is nothing. Though he strikes off many a fine and telling phrase, he by no means gives the reader any impression of intent to do this, as is sometimes felt in his writing. He is just an earnest minister of religion, who fears that the age is too filled with political strife to leave much room for devotions, and who is determined to give those who would lead a Christian life—and especially the younger generation—the best help he can. No reliable catechism, which is at the same time very brief, exists; the young, tired of the lengthy exhortations, miscalled prayers, are forsaking the habit of prayer; and that personal guidance in the religious conduct of life, which is the highest power of the ministry, is so generally neglected for the more popular field of preaching to the crowd, that Jeremy Taylor decides to prepare a book which shall help to supply these wants.

He was well qualified to undertake such a task. He was a scholar who by his own energies had succeeded in attaining a high place in the world of his day. Born in Cambridge in 1613, the son of a barber there, he worked hard, won scholarships, toiled through Caius College, and gained his M.A. by the time he was twenty. Ordained soon after, he gave himself to the work of preaching. He realised the power of the pulpit and was not slow in using it. Style, energy, and a handsome presence helped the warm devotion of the preacher in his work, and he speedily became known as a man of promise and power. Looking into Lombart’s engraving of him, the kindly yet strong glancing of the eyes almost seems as though they could move now with the fire of passionate enthusiasm. Small wonder that Laud, soon to be Archbishop of Canterbury, should speedily settle on securing that young man: he would be highly useful in the struggle that was drawing nearer every day: such a defender of the Church of England, so fine an expounder of her principles and her ideals was rare indeed to find: he must be encouraged. It was just a chance, as we should say, which brought young Taylor up from Cambridge to preach at St. Paul’s Cathedral for a friend who had, unexpectedly, another engagement; but it drew the new preacher away from his quiet and meagre fellowship, and brought him into the first circle of the land. Chaplain to Laud himself, Taylor soon became a Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the King, and, by Laud’s influence, was made a Fellow of All Souls’, Oxford, against the constitutional usage. Afterwards, by the publication of a book which pleased the King, he was given the degree of Doctor of Divinity, Oxford acting in obedience to the Royal command; and when the Civil War broke out, the young divine was immediately created Chaplain of the Forces. This was an honour, but, like many of Charles’s honours, a costly one. For the living he held was sequestered, and the small estate he owned taken by authority of Parliament. As the war progressed his fortunes sank lower and lower, until at length he was taken prisoner by some of the Cromwellian troops, and for a time was in danger of losing his life. Happily an escape was given him, and he sought refuge with his friend the Earl of Carberry, whose seat, Golden Grove, in Carmarthenshire, was henceforth for years Taylor’s home. Here he opened a school for preparation for the Universities, though small result came of it. Here he became closely acquainted with Rachel, afterwards Lady

Russell, who in 1653 had married Lord Vaughan, the Earl’s son; and readers of her grave, interesting letters will find very many signs of the influence of Jeremy Taylor during those formative, impressionable years of the brave lady’s life. At Golden Grove, too, were written all of his famous works, except a few separate sermons. From that home are dated the “Holy Living,” the “Holy Dying,” the “Liberty of Prophesying,” the two series of “Sermons for the Christian Year,” the “Life of Christ,” the “Ductor Dubitantium” (“a moral demonstration” of Christianity, called forth by contact with Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and considered by Taylor his life’s best work), and the volume which is named at the head of this paper. It was a haven of peace for him, a time for quiet thought, of which, when he wrote the “Liberty of Prophesying,” he said in his dedication: “In the great storm which dashed the vessel of the Church in pieces, I was cast on the coast of Wales, and, in a little boat, thought to have enjoyed that rest and quietness which in England I could not hope for. Here I cast anchor; and—thinking to ride safely—the storm followed me with so impetuous a violence that it broke a cable, and I lost my anchor. And here again I was exposed to the mercy of the sea, and the gentleness of an element that could neither distinguish things nor persons. And but that He who stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of His waves, and the madness of His people, had provided a plank for me, I had been lost to all the opportunities of content and study. But I know not whether I have been more preserved by the courtesies of my friends or the gentleness and mercies of a noble enemy.”

This was the only peaceful time of his life. It had its shadows. His dear friend, the Countess, died soon after his settlement, and later he was to feel that terrible blow to his high royalism—the execution of King Charles. But compared with what had gone before and with what was yet to come, it was a time of quiet and enjoyed activity. Afterwards he was to have trying experiences. He was to go to Ireland, to be attacked by the Presbyterian “triers,” to be most vigorously accused for such “Popish superstitions” as the sign of the cross used at baptism, and generally to have his life made a misery to him because he was such a convinced Episcopalian. Then, when brighter days came for the royalists, when he had signed the petition to Charles II. to return, the reward that came to him was a bishopric—not in the England he loved, but in the Ireland he hated, and in that very district of it which had already witnessed his discomfiture. The vexed years were to go by, spent in conflict with those Presbyterians whom he and others, by refusing to recognise as a “body,” slowly forced into an alliance which has produced the “loyal” Presbyterians of Ulster. In vain would he petition friends in England to secure him translation to an English bishopric. He was to die in Ireland, after reaching the depth of a man’s possible sorrows—the loss, one by one, of all his children.

It was a sad and vexing time that lay before him as he wrote his works at Golden Grove, but hidden from him mercifully in the years, so that he could write on with the happiest peace of mind. His literary as well as his religious powers found and kept a gentle, restful way, and his books often suggest to us, as we read them to-day, that they were written for a leisured class and age. But there is one key that he himself gives us, in the "Golden Grove," which unlocks the meaning of his life's serenity amid all the turmoil of circumstances—he lived for God. Sacramentalist in theory as he was, staunch Episcopalian, ardent Anglican, he yet cared most for the great things of God, those realities which exist without the need of creeds or ceremonies—the soul's own high communings. "Give me a love to Religion, an unwearied spirit in the things of God," he prays. Advising the young, he says: "Make religion the business of your life, your study, and chiefest care, and be sure that in all things a spiritual guide take you by the hand." So that in all things, even in the chance conversations of friends, the thought of God, the sense of His presence, shall be ever acknowledged. "Entertain no long discourses with any but if you can bring in something to season it with Religion: as God must be in all your thoughts, so, if it be possible, let Him be in all your discourses, at least let Him be at one end of it: and when you can speak of Him, be sure you forget not to speak of Him."

Whatever else be said or thought of Jeremy Taylor, we shall get little good of his book, the "Golden Grove," unless we are prepared to find in it the self-revelation of one who, in a troublous and worldly age, lived in close and intimate communion with the God and Father of us all.

EDGAR DAPLYN.

A CIRCULAR has been issued by the officers and ministers of the two Liverpool Domestic Missions announcing a Conference of those interested in domestic missions to the poor, to be held at the Domestic Mission, Mill-street, Liverpool, on Tuesday and Wednesday, April 18 and 19 next. The work of the domestic missionary is one of the most powerful agencies for good that exist in our midst, and it is felt that an interchange of views with regard to methods adopted by the various missions, and the relations between these and other agencies working in a similar direction, cannot fail to be of benefit and really helpful to those who are face to face with the same problems. The missionaries and the committee of our domestic missions throughout the country are cordially invited to co-operate, and it is hoped that as many as possible of the supporters of the missions and other friends will attend, in order to ensure the success of the Conference, and lead to future gatherings of a similar character. All communications as to the Conference should be addressed to Sir John T. Brunner, Bart, M.P., President of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, Mill-street.

LITERATURE.

RELIGION IN GREEK LITERATURE.*

THIS volume of nearly four hundred pages—"a sketch in outline"—is a part of two courses of twelve lectures delivered on Professor Campbell's appointment to the Gifford Lectureship of the University of St. Andrews, after his retirement from the Greek chair. Feeling that "recent researches into the culture of prehistoric times have tended rather to obscure the abiding interest of the age of classical literature in Greece," the Emeritus Professor seeks to "emphasise the element of religious feeling and reflection which pervades that literature." It is not the fault, perhaps, of ancient times that they appear to us so often as "dry antiquity." They are so helpless and so much at the mercy of the younger generations. But "dry antiquity," once bald of facts, seems at length, like Elisha, to have its revenge, and now "the crowding of new facts," like a troop of bears, seems destined to swallow up the judgment of the younger generations. It is the faith, however, of the Professor that, if "in the future, thought should keep pace with knowledge," all will be well, and he himself sets a commendable example of not presuming to let a mere array of facts mislead us, or to suppose that we possess more than we do, or to draw conclusions on behalf of pet theories from silence, filled in by any facts we please. The "argument from silence" he shows over and over again may be highly fallacious, and that what, for a given theory may have seemed a golden silence, may after all turn out to be ironic, and upset the gravity of the theory. "The air is full of generalisations gathered from a wide and various field, many of which may serve to guide and enlighten observation, but none of them can be regarded as exhaustive." "Our materials for constructing an image of prehistoric Hellas, although more abundant than what lay before Thucydides, are fragmentary in the extreme." "All is conjectural, but to let one's fancy play about the chasm of ignorance may at least serve to counteract the fallacy of supposing that times of which we know nothing were necessarily vacant of activity or altogether rude." "Many items of folklore demonstrably more primitive than anything in Homer make their appearance first at a later stage of Greek literature. That is only another proof of the fallaciousness of the argument from silence." "We know more of Greek life at Naucratis in northern Egypt in the sixth century than our fathers did, but our knowledge is still tantalisingly imperfect." "Our aim, however, will be to deal as far as possible with facts obtained at first hand, and to abstain from filling up with mere guess work, however plausibly supported, the gaps of knowledge." From all of which and much else, we come to the healthy conclusion that what we do not know is obviously not knowledge, and to fill in the vacuum with assumption is in most cases clearly presumption.

Perhaps in addition to the vast stores of knowledge set before us in this book, all worked up from the raw material into a tolerably sound fabric of religious conclusions, we are most indebted for the Professor's preliminary raid on time-worn formulas, as a necessary preparation for taking a wider, fuller, and more complex view of "the Hellenic contribution to the spiritual inheritance of humanity." "What, in a religious sense," asks Professor Campbell, "are we to understand by the Greek spirit? That is the question to be solved." "At the very threshold he sweeps aside some superficial and rhetorical commonplaces. Civilisation owes its law to the Romans, its religion to the Hebrews, and its beauty to the Greeks. So the formula runs. The Greek race, as a modern poet hath either said or sung, was "simply intoxicated with beauty." This is shown to be not only partial, but almost as misleading as another impression, that the Greeks excelled other races in "the power of enjoying life," of taking things lightly and not seriously. It is shown to be "a strange perversion, and ludicrous when applied to the fifth century B.C." And Professor Campbell deals similarly with another current formula, that the Greeks are the type of pure reason. "Not Pheidias now, or Polycleitus, but Aristotle is the prominent figure, 'the master of those that know.'" He points to the seventh century with its vague mystical yearnings and unreasoning emotions. And so likewise as to Greek "serenity" and Greek "moderation." The periods of Hellenic culture considered are:—

1. The prehistoric age, vaguely described as Mycenaean, of which we know very little, but of which scattered hints have lately been gathered by archaeological investigation. It was, in fact, the bloom of an advanced civilisation which had a very real existence whether to be called Achæan, Danaan, or Pelasgian.
2. The Homeric age, the product of this Achæan culture, transferred to the coasts of Asia Minor.
3. The growth of the great cities, and the first rise of philosophy in the sixth century B.C.
4. The period following the Persian war. The Attic genius takes the lead, while a wider Hellenism is reflected in the histories of Herodotus.
5. The development of philosophy, chiefly on Athenian soil. Intermingled with considerations of time, are considerations of race and locality.

Well, "my narrow leaves cannot in them contain the large discourse." The treatment is prolific in facts, prolific in suggestions, and the conclusions seem to depend on their own premises, and lead step by step to the broad and deep foundations of Socrates, and to the magnificent moral and religious structure raised loftily by Plato upon them.

The Greek religious world is the Professor's oyster, which he with the sword of the spirit has opened, and we find in Plato's thought of God, the world, the soul, and immortality, the Greek religion culminating, lying like a rich pearl in an iridescent shell, and we partly see and partly divine the points of origin, the process of growth, and behold the solid and the beautiful, rounding into shape out of the formless and the void, at the instigation of vague or keen disquiet, into yearnings, thoughts, reasonings. The inner spirit of the book, its "motif," as it were, may best be indicated by a short passage or two from the outset and the end. "It is not the timber," says Aristotle, "that makes a fabric, but the principle of carpentry." Professor Campbell points to the same divine origin for the Greek as for other religions, and notably Christianity. "What I desire to emphasise is," he says, "that in all this, for one who believes in a supreme wisdom and goodness—in other words, in a God of righteousness and truth—there is much which he cannot fail to recognise as of divine origin. The correspondence between the living pattern set before the Christian and the ideal of a perfect life, as conceived by Plato, is an argument that both are real." And his "endeavour has been to understand what the religion of the Hellenes was to that people themselves in its earlier stages, while they were still a people, and rather to hint than to explain the manner in which the religious experiences of that unforgettable past, the higher mind of Hellas, may still be profitable amidst the complex and conflicting circumstances of a radically altered world, 'for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.'" There is a deep tone of fresh present-day actuality given to the book, as of one writing from experience, and not only from a Professor's chair. Goethe has said: "People talk of the study of the Ancients, but what does it mean, except that we should look at the real world and strive to express it, for that is what they did." In such a spirit, in this book, have the Ancients been studied. It is not a history of "dry antiquity." "In answer to one who remarked, 'My chief desire is to leave the world a little better than I found it,' the late Lord Tennyson replied, 'My chief desire is to have a new vision of God.' . . . Another thinker of our time once said: 'The deepest want of our age is to have a new definition of God.'" "The acceptance of each new form of belief implies that our predecessors were mistaken, and if we look back far enough their leading thoughts assume an air of grotesque or even repulsive absurdity. However firmly we may rely upon our convictions, there is something in this discovery which is not comforting, and is apt to shake the foundations of religious belief." Such is the outset. At the end are the significant and hopeful words: "We are still far away from the 'new definition of God,' of which I spoke in the beginning of this volume, and the 'vision' is still shadowy and evanescent; yet if in the future thought should keep pace with knowledge, and the crowding of new facts should not weaken judgment, it may be that both the vision and definition may be simpler, more comprehensive, more far-reaching than anything mankind have hitherto conceived."

Through the tortuous courses of time, race, and locality the style keeps its even tenor—a fine example of the virtue of "animated moderation." Every now and then this even flow curves into a ripple and even sparkles with a momentary crest of a graceful and illuminating phrase. "The flower of the old mythology could not but fade, for it was a child of the twilight, and too fragile to endure the full light of awakening reflection. But beneath that many-coloured exuberance were the germs which I have tried to indicate of substantial thought—ideas which gradually came to ripeness in bold and reverent minds, eagerly persevering in the search for truth." To take one more example: "It has been sometimes said that religious music is the euthanasia of dogma; the Euripidean poetry may be similarly described as the euthanasia of mythology." But long before its euthanasia there were signs that polytheism, or rather that "luxe de croyance," mythology sat lightly on its believers, as this quaint story would indicate. "The altercation between Themistocles and the people of Andros is a late example of the activity of mythological fancy in its lighter and more fugitive manifestation. When he sought to requisition them for supplies, he said that the Athenians came in fellowship with two great gods—Persuasion and Compulsion. They replied that Athens seemed to be fortunate in her deities, but the people of Andros were less fortunate, since they had two worthless deities that ever haunted their land—namely, Poverty and Inability—wherefore they could not give." It is pleasant to perceive the normally human thus surging up through the mere seaweeds of polytheistic fancies and covering them with an Attic salt wave of pure ablution, like a sedate and sunny childlikeness breaking through childish make-believes.

THE EVANGEL OF JOY.*

THIS dainty booklet is especially welcome to those who are already acquainted with Miss Gibson as a powerful and passionate poet. Here, in a calmer mood, she gives us precious gems of thought; and yet, in their lustre, we can realise the fires of emotion, the storm and stress of experience, by which they have been fashioned and purified into their chastened beauty. The soul capable of this restrained and matured wisdom has not, indeed (to use the author's own words), been "clay in the hands of circumstances, but has seized circumstances to mould them to the will." Over and over again we are stimulated by the Gospel of the victory of a strenuous character over all the force of Destiny; Destiny can take much and destroy much, but there is one thing it cannot do; the Soul, in its impregnable fortress of moral endurance and spiritual vision, is able to defy the assaults of time and change. The "small troubles of life," which so often tend to disintegrate our strength, must not absorb the divine function of Grief; for (and the quiet sentence is the condensation of profound truth) "Grief was given thee for a nobler use." How the mystery of suffering, as we call it, is instantly solved by the utterance of the words "Love" and "Sympathy":—"Though Love come but to thee bearing the gift of suffering in his hands, and leaving it with thee, straightway vanish, take thou the gift thankfully, and hide it in thy heart." "Complain not if thou suffer: only through suffering canst thou gain the gift of a perfect sympathy." Then, how exquisitely are the consolations of God enumerated on page 13, in a passage too long to quote, where the Divine messengers to the weary soul are described as "Holy Sleep," the "Angel of the Dawn," the "Angel of thy Gift," the "Voice of the Singer," the "Mind of the Mystic," the "Eye of the Painter," the "Soul of the Poet," the "Skill of the Graver," the "Hand of the Babe": that last culminating touch is significant of the Erwigeweiliche, which pervades the whole of this Evangel as a spiritual atmosphere. One more extract we must give as evidence of the author's large sympathy for all religious forms that sustains faith in the Ideal:—"Cherish thy dream, whatsoever it be, so that the world have no power to intrude on thy solitude—whether it be a vision of Christ and the saints, a carefully planned utopia, a scheme of democracy, the meeting of thy soul with the Beloved." To many of us this beautiful little work will be an incentive and a help to cherish our best and noblest dreams.

THE current number of this most valuable quarterly is rich in varied interest. It is, perhaps, natural that at the present juncture of affairs in the United States the first place should be given to an article on Imperial Democracy, pleading that Colonial expansion is not the true destiny of the States. This is followed by a memorial article on the late Principal Caird, by the Rev. R. M. Wenley, describing the profound influence he exerted for the liberalising of religious thought in Scotland.

The alteration wrought by Caird might be summed up by saying that it was a passage from a theological unity, believed to rule from on high and worshipped afar, to a natural unity, known to be closer than breathing, nearer than hands and feet, and revealing itself in every soul as a cooperant part. . . .

Caird led Scotland—all unconscious—to abandon a theological for a historical standpoint. But when history turns out to be another name for the self-revelation of Deity, the transition loses half its difficulties and all its terrors.

The Rev. J. W. Chadwick writes on "Religious Ideals and Religious Unity," and in an article entitled "Harnack versus Harnack," the Rev. W. B. Smith examines the actual results of the great critic's most recent study of the New Testament. When Harnack's "Chronologie" was published, it was welcomed triumphantly by the upholders of the traditional view of New Testament history, especially in this country, as being a confession that the labours of the Tübingen critics and their successors in Holland and elsewhere had been proved to be futile, and that the traditional view was once more established as practically correct. This, Mr. Smith shows, is the impression that may be gathered from Harnack's Preface, but if the work itself is carefully examined it is found to be very far from the truth. On the crucial question of the Fourth Gospel Harnack's position is that it is not of apostolic authorship, but is the work of "John the Presbyter," who also made the Christian revision of a Jewish apocalypse, which we have as the Book of Revelation. With regard to the Epistles of James, Peter, Jude and Hebrews, he also denies the apostolic authorship, and in the Pastoral Epistles finds only scanty Pauline fragments. It seems, therefore, that he has little comfort to offer to any orthodox critics who read beyond the Preface of his book.

* "The Evangel of Joy." By Elizabeth Gibson. Grant Richards. 1s. net.

The articles on "The Religion of Mr. Kipling," "Adin Ballou and the Hopedale Community," and "Nanak and the Faith of the Sikhs," are full of interest. Professor Carroll Everett's article, "Beyond Good and Evil," is a masterly study of the strange and unexhilarating philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche, showing in conclusion that the world of which Nietzsche speaks as being beyond good and evil is rather below this distinction than above it, being that of the savage, in whom the moral ideal has not yet been created, and that his point of view is practically identical with that of the robber-baron of the Middle Ages. It was Christianity which made the real transformation of the world's estimates, pointing to a realm in which the moral law is fulfilled in love.

The remaining article is dated not from across the Atlantic, but from Oxford, and is by the Rev. J. Warschauer, now minister of the Oakfield-road Church, Clifton. "Paul and the Jerusalem Church" is the subject of this extremely able and suggestive article. It is an examination of the relations which subsisted between Paul and the elder apostles, and is a plea for a higher estimate of the work and aims of the latter, who in the New Testament records, and still more in popular estimation, have been cast so much into the shade by the greater brilliance and success of the apostle of the Gentiles.

Mr. Warschauer deals first with the difference of policy and method which separated Paul from the Church at Jerusalem, and then with the difference of doctrine. The position he takes up will be gathered from the following passage:—

We must apologise to the popular view of history for crediting these men [the apostles at Jerusalem] with motives other than reactionary, and designs containing a spark of that idealism which had irradiated the life and teachings of their Leader; nevertheless, we hold it to be a not improbable suggestion that they did, as a matter of fact, cherish such designs; that these were in harmony with the aspirations of Jesus himself; and that they might have been largely successful but for the interference of Paul. And since we have, contrary to our promise, ventured into the umbrageous realm of the might-have-been, we will go on to add that but for this circumstance the efforts of the Jerusalem Church might very well have resulted in the establishment of a widely-successful Christianity which would have included the race of Christ himself. That it would not have been the Christianity of Paul is true; on the other hand, it might have been nearer the Christianity of Christ. Whether the actual course events did take should be deplored, or whether it furnishes us with cause for rejoicing, is not a question with which we are here concerned, nor is it one which seems capable of solution.

At the end of his article, however, Mr. Warschauer admits that "the Palestinian ideal of a reformed Judaism was but a poor one compared with that of a world-wide Christian Church," and that "the elder apostles were not endowed with the splendid vision of Paul." It is an article worthy of the most serious attention, especially as it enforces the plea of Mr. Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures regarding the significance of "the Law" in the religious life of the Jews.

OBITUARY.

MRS. T. SMITH OSLER.

ONLY last year we recorded the passing away of the last surviving sister of the late Rev. John James Tayler, and now we have sorrowfully to announce the death at Hampstead on Saturday, Feb. 11, of his only remaining child, the devoted companion of the greater part of his honoured life, and since his death, the wife of Mr. T. Smith Osler. One other daughter died in infancy, and an only son, Mr. John Hutton Tayler, who greatly distinguished himself at college, and had just entered on a career of promise at the Bar, died in 1854, at the age of twenty-seven, to the unspeakable grief of his parents. Mrs. Osler was their eldest child; born May 3, 1826, at Manchester, in the early days of Mr. Tayler's ministry at Mosley-street Chapel, before its successor Upper Brook-street Church was built, and while the Rev. John Gooch Robberds was at Cross-street Chapel. Only for one year was the daughter separated from her parents, and then no further than a school in Liverpool. The early years of her womanhood coincided with the golden days of the Prospective Review, when the four editors, the Revs. James Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, Charles Wicksteed, and her father, held those delightful meetings for the planning of their work, which Dr. Martineau has described in his Memorial Preface to the last volume of Mr. Thom's sermons. The meetings were most often held at Mr. Tayler's house in York-place, because Manchester was mid-way between Liverpool and Leeds, and in the volume of his letters, subsequently edited by Mr. Thom, will be found other references to their vivid interest and happiness, of which the young people also had their share.

Miss Tayler moved with her parents to London in 1853, when Manchester New College, of which her father, who was Professor of Ecclesiastical History, became Principal, was established at University Hall. They lived first in Woburn-place, and from the summer of 1861 at the Limes, Rosslyn-hill, Hampstead. There Mrs. Tayler died in the following February, and father and daughter were alone for the remaining seven years of his life. In the summer of 1868 she shared with him that memorable journey to Transylvania, when he attended, at Thorda, the celebration of the 300th anniversary of the Unitarian Church of that country. In May of the following year Mr. Tayler died, but the house which had received the consecration of his beautiful and gracious spirit remained his daughter's home to the last, during all the years of her married life, in which the friends of a younger generation learned to know through her that same pure influence of the higher life.

In 1876 Mrs. Smith Osler re-issued the second edition of her father's "Retrospect of the Religious Life of England," enriched by an introductory chapter by Dr. Martineau, dealing with later developments since 1853, the year of its publication; and in 1877 she also published a last series of his sermons, keeping the title of the earlier volume of "Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty."

We must not touch upon the intimate sorrow which this departure inevitably brings, but within these memorial words there is a peculiar tenderness and reverence which cannot be uttered, in bidding farewell to one whose life was so rich in the highest interests, and so closely linked with the most sacred associations of our religious community.

The funeral service was held at Rosslyn Hill Chapel on Friday morning, followed by the interment at Highgate Cemetery.

MRS. HOWARD BLYTH.

MRS. HOWARD BLYTH, whose death, at the age of seventy-five, took place in Edinburgh, on the 6th inst., was the youngest of the five daughters of Robert Brittain Blyth, of Birmingham, who, early in the century, settled in Edinburgh, when he married and brought up a large family. Although, under the influence of the mother, the religious atmosphere of the home was strictly orthodox, Hannah Blyth early showed her independence of mind by attending, as quite a young woman, the Unitarian chapel, of which the Rev. George Harris was then the minister. In 1846 she was married to her cousin, Howard Blyth, whom she accompanied the same year to Australia, where, on a farm near Adelaide, they made their home for the next ten years, returning to Edinburgh in 1855. George Hope and William Smith were at that time leading members of the Unitarian Church, then under the ministry of the Rev. John Gordon, and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Blyth were welcome additions to the congregation. Though shrinking from anything like publicity—indeed, she strongly disapproved of the "new woman"—Mrs. Blyth, by her cultivated understanding, her profoundly sympathetic nature, and the moral earnestness which she infused into all her conversation, exercised an influence for good over a wide circle of friends and acquaintances, by whom her loss will be deeply mourned. The Rev. R. B. Drummond, who conducted the funeral service (after the Scottish fashion) at the house of the deceased, on the 9th inst., said "that she was one in whom strength of character and a high moral sense were united in a singular degree with amiability of temper and kindness of disposition. As the wife, the mother, the valued friend and adviser, she whose loss we mourn had adorned every part. 'She opened her mouth with wisdom, and the law of kindness was on her tongue.' All through her life she had set a fine example of fidelity to conviction and the disinterested love of truth, and her influence in the circle of her friends was ever exerted for whatever things are honest, just, and of good report." She was laid by the side of her husband, who had predeceased her by about a year and a-half, in the Grange Cemetery, in Edinburgh.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness."—Proverbs xxxi. 26.

THAT is a good verse to remember, and it is the second half of it I want to talk to you about. "In her tongue is the law of kindness." It is taken from the description of a good woman, with which the Book of Proverbs ends. She is very diligent and prudent, and looks well after her household; she is up early in the morning, and while she works herself sees that others are not idle. "She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children rise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her, saying: 'Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all.'" Most beautiful of all is the verse: "Her children rise up and call her blessed." And next, I think, come the words I want you specially to remember and think about: "In her tongue is the law of kindness."

Perhaps you think it is no very great praise to say a person is kind, and speaks kindly—that it is easier and more natural to be kind than unkind.

But wait a little, and think of all that it means, and then, perhaps, you will agree that it is not so very easy after all.

To be always kind you must have self-control. That means keeping our bad temper in check, like holding in a fierce horse with a bridle, not letting angry words break out, crushing down all mean thoughts, all selfishness and jealousy, never letting our lower nature get the upper hand. Until we have done this, and gained real control over ourselves, we cannot be sure of being always kind, and the law of kindness will not be in our tongue.

So you see at once it is not very easy. But those who fight bravely this battle between good and evil grow stronger and better able to do the work God asks of us all. It is strong character that helps most of all, and strong character is gained by always trying, and striving after what we know is good.

Well then, if you are provoked, always try to keep control over yourself; keep back the angry words that are so quick to come. Instead of answering back, hold yourself in, and you will be surprised how soon the anger is all gone, and what seemed such bad temper in the others is gone too.

There is a story about a wise priest in Ireland that I should like to tell you. He lived in a village where there was a very quarrelsome couple, and one day the wife came to him and complained bitterly of the miserable life she led because of her husband's bad temper. She could bear it no longer, and she begged the priest to help her. He listened quite seriously to her story, and then going to a cupboard took out a bottle, which he gave her. "My good woman," he said, "take this bottle of holy water, and every time your husband gets into a bad temper, take a spoonful of it, and keep it in your mouth for five minutes. You will find that he will soon be cured."

The woman thought it very strange, but she promised to do what the priest told her; and it was not long before she came back full of gratitude, saying that the water had a wonderful effect, and that her husband was getting quite good-tempered.

Of course you see what had happened. There was nothing special in the water, but when it was in her mouth she could not answer back! And you might do worse, when you are provoked, than think of that story and keep your mouth shut. Very soon you will learn to be thankful indeed that you are getting such control over yourself, and helping others also to keep from bad temper.

Then to be always kind we must learn to be thoroughly unselfish, ready to give up our own will, and think more of the pleasure of others than our own. That seems hard at first, but it is really the selfish people who are most miserable, and the happiest are those whose first thought is for others. You can always find ways of being unselfish, in doing unpleasant duties, which no one else wants to do, in giving up some pleasure to another; but it must be done with a bright and cheerful face, not to make others uncomfortable by letting them see you are giving up to them. That is the true unselfishness, and it will give you greater happiness than any selfish pleasure.

And again, we must be thoughtful and sympathetic. So often we say and do things that hurt other people, and our only excuse is: "I didn't mean to hurt her," "I didn't think he would mind." No, it was just thoughtlessness; but it is sad to think how much pain and misery is caused by want of thought. So remember to be thoughtful, and to have sympathy with others—that is, feel with others; think how they will feel and what they will like.

A poor woman in a workhouse once told me how dreary her life was, and then she said how eagerly she always looked forward to the visit of the Master of the workhouse. I asked whether he came often, and she said: "O, no, he's too busy, and he never has time for more than a word or two with you, but what he says, he says in such a kind way, it quite warms your heart." It made me think how much can be done by a few kind sympathetic words, how easy they are to speak and how often we neglect to say them. It made me wish that we were all more thoughtful and cared more to do our part to make sunshine in the world.

Now do you see how much goes to make real kindness—self-control, unselfishness, thoughtfulness and sympathy. Only when you have learnt to have all these will the law of kindness be in your tongue, because it will be in your heart. But do not think it is too much to ask, and too difficult. Begin at once, and every step onwards and upwards will give you a new happiness. Remember, it is God who asks it of us, and He helps us when we try, because we are His children. E. M.

LET nothing issue from your mind until it has been steeped in love. Let tender mercies be over all your works. That is the meaning of "courtesy," as used in the Scriptures—loving-minded, everything bathed in love. Now, I think you will see with me what a terrible lack there is of Scriptural courtesy even in Christian lives that are strong in faith. Many of us have faith, but we have not this adornment of courtesy, steeping everything in a loving mind. There is far too prevalent among us a rough, unfinished conscientiousness; a rugged truthfulness, a bluff and almost rude honesty. Well, conscientiousness is good, but it need not be rough. Truthfulness is good, but it need not be rugged. Honesty is good, but it need not be rude. Conscientiousness, truthfulness, honesty, are all essential elements in a sound mind; but God wants us to be more than sound-minded. He wants us to be loving-minded. He wants all these elements to be refined into loveliness; He wants strength to be clothed with beauty; He wants faithfulness to wear a garment of courtesy. He wants all things to be perfected, to wear a spiritual polish, to be lovely.—The Rev. J. H. Jowett.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Selected from Ecclesiasticus, 19-21.

HE that despiseth small things shall fall by little and little.

Whoso taketh pleasure in wickedness shall be condemned, but he that resisteth crowneth his life.

He that can rule his tongue shall live without strife.

The lips of talkers will be telling such things as pertain not unto them: but the words of such as have understanding are weighed in the balance.

The heart of fools is in their mouth, but the mouth of wise men is in their heart.

To slip upon a pavement is better than to slip with the tongue. A whisperer defileth his own soul, and is hated where-soever he dwelleth.

A wise man will hold his tongue till he see opportunity: but a babler and a fool will regard no time.

A wise man by his words maketh himself beloved.

It is much better to reprove than to be angry secretly: and he that confesseth his fault shall be preserved from hurt.

How good is it, when thou art reproved, to show repentance! for so shalt thou escape wilful sin.

Admonish a friend. It may be he hath not done it; and if he have done it, that he do it no more.

Admonish thy friend. It may be he hath not said it; or if he have, that he speak it not again.

Admonish a friend: for many times it is a slander; and believe not every tale.

There is one that slippeth in his speech, but not from his heart; and who is he that hath not offended with his tongue?

Admonish thy neighbour before thou threaten him: and not being angry, give place to the law of the Most High.

The fear of the Lord is the first step to be accepted of Him, and wisdom obtaineth His love.

The knowledge of the commandments of the Lord is the doctrine of life: and they that do things that please Him shall receive the fruit of the tree of immortality.

The fear of the Lord is all wisdom; and in all wisdom is the performance of the law, and the knowledge of His omnipotency.

The knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom, neither at any time the counsel of sinners' prudence.

He that hath small understanding and feareth God, is better than one that hath much wisdom and transgresseth the law of the Most High.

RELIGION AND THE CHURCH.

THE people of England seem to be at last awakening to the truth that to have a church or churches is not the same thing as to have a religion. Churches are, that religion may be realised: but it does not follow that to multiply or enlarge churches is to realise religion. On the contrary, it is possible by having too much church to have too little religion; the most perfectly organised and administered ecclesiasticism may but effectually imprison the living Spirit of God. The churches are the means, but religion is the end; and if they, instead of being well content to be and to be held means, good in the degree of their fitness and efficiency, regard and give themselves out as ends, then they become simply the most irreligious of institutions, mischievous exactly in proportion to their strength. Religion is too rich and varied a thing to be capable of incorporation in any one church, or even in all the churches; and the church that claims to be able to embody it, whether for a people or for humanity, simply shows the poverty and impotence of its own religious ideal. It is a small thing, nay more, an easy thing, for a church to make out its historical continuity and catholicity—that is only a matter of deft criticism and courageous argument; but it is a great thing for any church to have created, or to be creating, a society correspondent to the ideal of Christ.

So wrote Dr. FAIRBAIRN, in the Contemporary Review of March, 1884, at the opening of an article on "The Churches and the Ideal of Religion," which now holds the first place in his new volume on Catholicism.* This volume is a very timely reprint of articles contributed to the Contemporary Review, dealing chiefly with the character, progress and religious significance of the Catholic revival in this country, but including also a review of Mr. BALFOUR'S "Foundations of Belief," an article on "Some recent English Theologians," and a concluding study of "Oxford and Jowett." It is a timely reprint, because amid the excitement of the present controversy in the Church of England it is of the utmost importance to have a clear grasp of first principles, and to understand what we mean by religion and by the Church. The contrast between the sacerdotalism of the Catholic Church, both Roman and Anglican, and the spiritual religion of Jesus, the historical origin of sacerdotalism in the Christian Church, and the necessary results of the dominance of that theory in the midst of the religious movements of our time, these are matters on which it is essential that we should form an instructed opinion, and arrive at convictions unwarped either by sentiment or passion, and to this end no more valuable help has been provided in the present crisis than this volume of Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S.

The religious position of NEWMAN and the other leaders of the Tractarian movement, which was the beginning of the Catholic revival, is subjected to a searching criticism, but at the hands of a sympathetic and generous critic. Dr. FAIRBAIRN was strongly drawn towards these men, and acknowledges an indebtedness of the whole country to the new ideal of worship which they so earnestly exemplified. "The religious spirit of England," he says, "is, in all its sections and varieties, sweeter to-day than it was forty years ago, more open to the ministries of art and the graciousness of order, possessed of a larger sense of 'the community of the saints,' the kinship and continuity of the Christian society in all ages." And yet when one goes to the root of the matter, and thinks out the Anglo-Catholic theory, it is found to be radically at variance with the true ideal of religious life.

A significant warning is found in the fact that "the Church," with its authoritative priesthood and essential sacraments, can condemn as "mere heathens, except in knowledge," as NEWMAN did in his Via Media, the whole body of the Society of Friends, because of their denial of the efficacy of the sacraments. This condemnation, Dr. FAIRBAIRN says, "of some of the most beautiful and devoted spirits that have adorned the religion and promoted the philanthropies of modern times, may be good ecclesiasticism, but it is bad Christianity"; and this is but one example of what the theory involves, when carried to its logical issues.

The religion of Jesus had very different implications. His was a spirit broad as humanity, with faith in God-given faculties and the natural religiousness of man.

Measured by the standard of a sacerdotal religion, Jesus was not a pious person; He spoke no word, did no act, that implied a priesthood for His people;

He enforced no sacerdotal observance, instituted no sacerdotal order, promulgated no sacerdotal law; but simply required that His people should be perfect as their Father in heaven is perfect. And so what He founded was a society to realise His own ideal, a kingdom of heaven, spiritual, eternal, which came without observation: a realm where the will of God is law, and the law is love, and the citizens are the loving and the obedient.

And in another passage Dr. FAIRBAIRN no less unmistakably declares that there is no evidence that Jesus ever created, or thought of creating, an organised society. Not "the Church," but the kingdom of God, or of heaven, was his ideal, a kingdom not outwardly organised, or capable of organisation, but "essentially the contrary and contrast of what is now understood as the Catholic Church, whether Roman or Anglican."

The strongest impression left upon us by this masterly book is of the need of a more faithful witness on the part of the Free Churches to the power of spiritual religion. Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S analysis of NEWMAN'S teaching points to the radical scepticism involved in his distrust of human reason and his consequent surrender to the authority of a mediæval Church, rather than to the free spirit of CHRIST, and adds a noble plea for the authority and the divine significance of reason, which, Dr. FAIRBAIRN says, is as holy to him as the Church is to NEWMAN. "It is too godlike to be inimical to God; scepticism is not the essence but the accident of its activity." He further points out that the two greatest and most religious poets of the Victorian Era were untouched by the Anglo-Catholic movement, except to protest, and that while TENNYSON and BROWNING took a freer flight, and had a firmer hold on spiritual realities, the poetry of the movement, of which there was no lack, was the work of minor poets, and has been "mainly reminiscent and sentimental, not spontaneous and imaginative."

But while such considerations are ample to convince us of the deficiencies of the Anglo-Catholic system, there is something more than argument historical and philosophical required to make headway against the influence of the sacerdotalists in the Church. The undoubted self-sacrificing devotion and ardent zeal of the priests have established a hold upon the people in many quarters, where argument as to underlying principles and logical issues would have little weight; and altogether, while controversy is inevitable, and useful so far as it can be kept free from old antipathies and the bitter passions of fanaticism, that will not suffice for the turning of the tide of religious life into healthier channels.

What is required is a more effectual demonstration of the living power of religion in the Churches which have faith in the freedom of the spirit, a demonstration which shall set clearly before the people a nobler ideal of religious life, and truer lineaments of the kingdom of God.

It must be seen and felt that in the Free Churches there is a spirit as devout, a reverence as profound as in any sacerdotal Church, and that those who deny the authority of the priest, deny it for the sake of a higher and holier allegiance. There must be not only as ardent devotion, but as single-hearted eagerness to serve all human needs, to befriend the lonely and oppressed, to bring the influence of a holier life to those who are enslaved by the most squalid and degraded circumstances. And, beyond this, there must be a wider outlook, and with new power the religion of the Free Churches must claim the world as the sphere of its activity. When men are made to feel, by demonstration of the spirit, that all truth is of God, that all the earth is aflame with the glory of the Lord, that in the order of society may be the law of the Most High, the justice and the compassion of the Eternal, that in simple brotherhood is a revelation of the love of God, and all common work is done as in His sight, and with the happiness of those who are members of one household, then they will be no longer touched by the glamour of the sacerdotal Church. They will know that there is a power of religion more effectual, more truly human, and, for that very reason, more divine, bringing men nearer to God, lifting off their burdens, filling their hearts with a better hope of His kingdom.

CHRIST AND COMMON PEOPLE.

I.—COMMON PEOPLE.

HAVE we a gospel for common people? Jesus had. He brought religion into touch with common life, expressed its truths in common language, and made clear the Divine presence to common people.

Are we doing the same?

The common people heard Jesus gladly. Do the common people hear us gladly? If not, is it that the needs of common people are different in our day, or that the preachers preach the same gospel less ardently? Or do we preach another gospel to that of Christ? If the same and to the same common needs, why not with the same result?

Are common people more blind or more deaf in our day than they were in his? Do they have ears and hear not, eyes and see not, as was not the case in his day? Or have they the same common faults they had, but no longer the same strong saviour to save them from their faults? Is it not the teachers who are more indifferent to their dulness, less careful to overcome it, less anxious than Jesus to unstop the deaf ears and to open the blind eyes?

What are common people? And what are their most common needs, and what is most commonly required ere the good news can be proclaimed of a new goodness in their midst?

Are we not all common people? Are we not blind, and deaf, and halting between two opinions, with the leprosy of selfishness, the death of sin, and the poverty of a very feeble spiritual life? What shall rouse such men?

Nothing, surely, save something that is powerfully planned. Good news for common people must be news of some common good, some great good commonly felt to come from it. The gospel that shall rouse common people is the news of one who heals their sickness, who gives the richest thoughts to the poorest soul, who makes the lame man leap—out of many hesitations to one great conclusion—who puts life into a dead cause (and had not the cause of the common people long been judged a dead cause in Jesus' day?), who drums on the common ear such striking words as strike into the heart, and compels the blind, by the force of his illustration, to see clearly.

Jesus compelled men into the Kingdom of God. This news of a compelling spiritual power able to overmaster their own indifference is the best news, and the only kind of news that really comes as the gospel to common people.

Their trouble is that they could enter God's kingdom if they wanted to, but they do not want to.

Jesus so showed them the Kingdom of God that he compelled them to want to enter it.

This was Jesus' gospel for those who did not want it, that he would force it on them. He opened the lids of their eyes and showed them what they did not want to see—the truth. He unstopped their deaf ears and compelled them to hear what they did not want to listen to—the Word of God. And thus he healed them.

Jesus' method is the only method that meets the needs of common people, whose common fault is this: that they do not see and do not hear anything at all that is not forced upon their notice.

It is the only salvation for all of us whose chief fault it is that we are not caring or trying to save ourselves; who are ourselves our own greatest enemy. We need in a saviour one who, regardless of our protests and struggles to escape, pursues us relentlessly, fights against us, and saves us from ourselves.

The preacher who only preaches the Word of God to those who are willing to hear it—who shows God's Truth to those only who come with open eyes to see it—is no disciple of Jesus Christ.

Good and glorious in its heathen way as such a man's work may be, it is not the work which is known to the world as Christian: it is not in any especial way Christ-like. Such a preacher does not save, he does not rescue; for the most part he does not reach the secret trouble of the ordinary man—his trouble with himself and with his own wilful blindness and deafness.

Have we a gospel for common people? Have we any good news to tell of the common consequence of our preaching, and its effects among the common people, "Go your way and tell the orthodox Churches the things which ye do hear and see; the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good tidings preached to them, and blessed is he whosoever shall find none occasion of stumbling in Unitarianism?"

Have we the good news to tell that Jesus had? Can we send to the prison-house of creeds such a message as his?

Have we the same gospel that he had, the good news of good work done among the multitudes and masses of the common people? Or have we another gospel than that of Christ? or are we of another spirit than his? Who, then, shall save the world, if they who love it teach it falsehood, and they who have all knowledge do not love it?

Are we trying? Jesus tried. Are we trying?

The leprous and the unclean, and those whose secret selfishness of purpose so commonly spoils so many common lives, and those who do not wish to learn to love their neighbours as themselves, and stand on purpose afar off from all our preaching—are we cleansing these lepers? Are we reputed, as Jesus was, able to cleanse such—till even they themselves come to us to be cleansed?

The maniac who cries that the Holy One of God may not come near him; and the legion of devils that desires so ardently not to be cast out, and degradation that asks to sink into swine; are we speaking with authority, plunging the swine, like a millstone, into the depths of the sea of repentance and driving this demoniac desire out of all possessed with it?

If not, we have no good news to bring to common people.

The dead stir not, and ask no man to raise them. The poor, debased, and impoverished spirit seeks no further lessons to learn, and avoids instruction. Jesus, almost by force—by spiritual force, by the forced hours of his long day's labour and his all-night's prayer, by forced marches, by force of character, speech and example, by parable and simile and mental force, by forcible gesture and the force of his language, by forcible disregard of opposition and by talking till men stopped their ears and rushed upon him as their only escape from hearing—so overmastered the wickedness, blindness, deafness, and indifference of his time, and so forced an entrance for his gospel through the eyes and ears and senses into the hearts and minds and lives of common people, that he roused their indifference into earnest attention, overcame man's perpetual evil with God's incessant goodness, and saved men at the last who had never expected to be saved at the first.

He was not polite to the wickedness of men. In God's world it is surely rude vulgarity only that asks the word of God always to bow to the amour propre (or impropre) of sin. Far otherwise did Jesus treat wickedness, and showed it the scorn and contempt it deserved, and is reputed of all men for this the most supremely "gentle" man. It soon became good news in Christ's day, that men were no longer to be left to themselves; that God had sent a prophet to speak to them, and a saviour to save them. And this gospel of God spread far and wide; for Jesus knew, as few preachers ever have known, not "what" he stood for, but "whom." He was come to preach God to common people. WILFRED HARRIS.

He that never changed any of his opinions, never corrected any of his mistakes: and he who was never wise enough to find out any mistakes in himself, will not be charitable enough to excuse what he reckons mistakes in others.—Benjamin Whichcote.

THE FREE CHURCH CATECHISM.

SIR,—My friend Mr. Page Hopps is very eager "to deal very frankly indeed with Dr. Horton and Dr. Clifford" concerning the Free Church Catechism. No one will object; but it is only fair your readers should be put right on one matter of fact—namely, that the compilers of the Catechism had not the advantage of the services of Dr. Horton in framing that document. The representatives of the Congregationalists were Drs. Berry, Barrett, Mackennal, Rogers, and Professor Vernon Bartlett.

IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to what has actually been done by the British Government on behalf of Catholic collegiate education in Ireland during the last century? Our people have short memories, and to hear some of them talk, one would think that the Catholic University grievance was a new thing in Irish politics, and that no honest attempts had been made to meet it, short of wholesale sacrifice of principle.

In 1795, during Earl Fitzwilliam's lord-lieutenancy and under Grattan's guidance, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, was established by the Irish Parliament (wholly Protestant) for the education of the Catholic laity and priesthood. Grants of £8,000 were made in 1795, £7,000 in 1796, £10,000 in 1797, £10,000 in 1798, and £8,000 in 1799. The Imperial Parliament at the time of the Union took over the obligation and continued the grant; but the lay element disappeared, and the College became simply a seminary for the priesthood. Acrid discussions took place yearly when the grant was proposed, but it was continued in varying amounts, without intermission, until 1846, when Sir Robert Peel carried a Bill, by 328 votes to 176, giving an increased annual grant of £26,360 (made into a permanent appropriation, to save the constant discussions) and an extra grant of £30,000 with which to enlarge the College so as to receive 500 students, all destined for the priesthood. The Irish Church Disestablishment Act of 1869 provided for the commutation of this grant in return for a capital sum of £372,331. Not a bad endowment for an Irish Catholic Sectarian College to receive from a British Government! For all practical purposes, Maynooth may still be regarded as a Catholic College, heavily endowed by the State.

Sir Robert Peel, who was actuated by an earnest desire to lay the Catholic grievance and to give a generous education to the Catholic youth of Ireland, did not stop with this greatly-increased endowment to a college exclusively set apart for the education of the priesthood. At the same time (1845) his Government brought forward a Bill for the establishment of three new colleges—one at Belfast, another at Cork, and a third at Galway—to promote middle-class education in Ireland on the principle of perfect religious equality. The brilliant "Young Ireland" party rejoiced at the prospect of such a measure; the Catholic laity generally were ready to accept the Bill as a solution of the difficulty with some slight emendations; but Daniel O'Connell fiercely opposed it—mainly, I am afraid, because the "Young Ireland" men supported it—taking up Sir Robert Inglis's catch-cri that it meant a "godless education"; and the Catholic priesthood insisted on several drastic amendments before they could give it their blessing. They demanded that a fair proportion of the appointments should be given to approved Catholics; that the Catholic prelates should form part of the Governing Board; that Catholic professors of history, logic, metaphysics, moral philosophy, geology, and anatomy must be appointed, or Catholic students could not be allowed to attend the lectures; and that a Catholic chaplain should be appointed by the Bishop at each college, with a suitable salary, to superintend the moral and religious instruction of the Catholic students. The Government made several concessions, but could not grant all. They had no objection to chairs of theology being privately endowed, or divinity halls being built by any denomination; they excluded moral philosophy and Irish history from the course of education; they were willing to have Catholic chaplains for Catholic students, but without salary from the public funds. And so the Queen's Colleges were established in Ireland. The Catholic primate announced that he would give the new scheme a fair trial; so did the Bishops at Belfast, Cork, and Galway. But the majority of the dignitaries held aloof, and before long all withdrew their support under instructions from Rome.

In 1850 the "Queen's University in Ireland" was established, with its centre at Dublin, the three Queen's Colleges being affiliated to that University, which granted degrees in arts, medicine, law, and engineering to students who received their education at one of these colleges. Ireland was thus provided with a second teaching University; and in its short existence of twenty-nine years the Queen's University proved its high merit in sending out to the world some of the most distinguished men in the various faculties. Up to the time of the undeserved extinction of that University the number of students who had passed through the three colleges was as follows:—Protestant Episcopalians, 4,041; Roman Catholics, 3,887; Presbyterians, 2,585; various, 806—total, 11,319. The college at Galway has never been a success in point of attendance; but those at Cork and Belfast were and are. The proportion of Catholic students at Cork has always been about half. The Queen's Colleges may not have done all they were intended to do for Catholic students, but that is because the Church has tried to ban them. Fortunately many Catholic parents have refused to be intimidated, and their sons have sat side by side with Protestants on the college benches, to the mutual advantage of both sets. We have the Bishop of Limerick's authority for the statement that there are now a hundred Catholic students at Trinity College.

In 1871 all religious tests were abolished from Dublin University, and Trinity College was thrown open without reserve to students of all denominations, Catholic or Protestant, no subscription of the Articles being required except in the faculty of theology. This was intended as a boon to Catholics as well as to those Protestants who before disestablishment had been called Nonconformists; but the Catholic hierarchy, which has blessed Oxford and Cambridge Universities by the Papal Rescript of 1895, permitting its students to go freely among others in these ancient educational establishments, has stubbornly refused to do the same with Dublin. Yet there is no real difference between the cases; the reason is that the priesthood think they can secure greater concessions for their faith in Ireland than they can ever do in England.

In 1873 Mr. Gladstone wrecked a strong Government in a kindly but ill-advised attempt to propitiate the Catholics by reconstituting Dublin University. The general idea of the scheme was to incorporate the Queen's Colleges with Trinity in a larger Dublin University, from which theology, moral philosophy, and modern history should be excluded; but the scheme met with no support, and fell dead. Not so with Lord Beaconsfield's Act of 1879, which most unfairly, and almost at a moment's notice, abolished the Queen's University that required a three years' course of teaching at one of the Queen's Colleges, and substituted the Royal University of Ireland—an examining corporation only, framed on the model of London University, except that a large proportion of its senate, examiners, and fellows was deliberately selected so as to conciliate the Catholics. The Royal University was founded for one reason only—to please the Catholics; and the "godless" University, which had done admirable work, was destroyed for the same sole reason.

And, as a matter of fact, in spite of their protests, the Royal University has, on the whole, given great satisfaction to the Catholics. They have availed themselves, priesthood and laity, of its advantages: they have taken its degrees, gained many of its prizes, and, in open competition with the Protestants from the north, carried off a large and creditable share of its honours. What is there to grumble at? One would imagine there was no such thing as a University in Ireland in which Catholic students can secure degrees and win honours. Much is said against Trinity College, Dublin, and Queen's College, Belfast, and they are called Protestant Colleges (which they are not, except in "atmosphere"); but hardly a word is said by Catholics about the Royal University in which they have an exactly equal chance with Protestants, and which they could easily capture by crowding their students into it and so creating a "Catholic atmosphere." Yet this institution has twenty years of honoured history behind it; for the good work of the Queen's University has been continued in it, as far as was practicable in an institution whose degrees were thrown open to all comers on passing a series of examinations. The standard of examination has been seldom inferior, generally equal, and in some directions superior, to that of London University. It was the first University in the kingdom to throw open all its degrees and honours to women students; and Catholic women, as well as Catholic priests (a numerous proportion of its graduates) have distinguished themselves in open competition. The fact is, the Irish Catholic priesthood have no desire to see the Royal University destroyed; but they hope either to have it made thoroughly Catholic by Act of Parliament, or, as they would prefer, to have a new and practically exclusive University established for them on their own lines in addition. "This ought ye to have done and not to have left the other undone" is their plea. There is already in existence an association of Colleges known as "The Catholic University of Ireland," founded in 1851 and re-organised in 1882. It is, of course, without a charter of incorporation, and so has no power to grant degrees; but it is there ready for its charter, when this or any other Government dares to propose to grant it. The Bishop of Limerick acknowledges that this "University" is "a comparative failure," chiefly because of its disability in the matter of conferring degrees; but he boasts (and not without reason) that its principal College, in St. Stephen's Green, holds a remarkably high place in the examinations of the Royal University. At present the "Catholic University" consists of the following Colleges:—St. Patrick's (Maynooth), University (St. Stephen's Green), St. Patrick's (Carlow), University (Blackrock), Holy Cross (Clonliffe), and the Medical School (Cecilia-street, Dublin).

We have Mr. Balfour's authority for the statement (which I have not seen contradicted) that the fellowships of the Royal University are in the main, as they were intended to be, held by Catholics; and also that "these fellowships are pooled, and the money goes, as there is no legal reason why it should not go, towards the support of this highly denominational institution [University College, Dublin, under Jesuit control]." I agree that there is no reason why Catholic fellows should not do as they please with the proceeds of their fellowship. It is no concern of ours whether they do or do not choose to use this money for the voluntary endowment of a sectarian institution. But when Mr. Balfour proceeds to argue that this constitutes "a far more denominational system for the use of public funds" than is the one he proposes, he cannot make us responsible for the application of money prizes intended to mark personal merit, or drive us into a deliberate denominationalism and sectarianising policy which we abhor.

If I am not trespassing too much on your space, I should like to send a third letter on this subject next week.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—Whether many or few of your readers will be satisfied with the reply of the managers to Mr. Spears' and Mr. Blazeby's letters may be debated, but I think there are a good many who will thank these ministers for raising the question to which their letters refer. In a Free Church it surely is well that a free expression of opinion is encouraged. Mr. Spears and Mr. Blazeby are under the impression, in which I confess I share, that at the Conference when this Fund was raised, none amongst the general assembly ever dreamt that it would go to the support of ministers proclaiming themselves ostentatiously non-Christian. There would have been a lively discussion had it been so understood, and the resolution would not have been suffered to pass with the comparative unanimity that it did.

It seems to be considered by the managers of the Fund that because Mr. Conway and Mr. Voysey, sen., were invited to the meeting (I do not think they were present), therefore the managers' claim to be unlimited in "the width" of their dispensation of the Fund, is incontrovertible.

I remember very distinctly that at this Conference I and several other Sunday-school teachers wanted much to introduce a subject that we thought vitally affected the direct Christian teaching in the schools, polyonymous as they were and are, following in this respect the congregations more or less to which they are attached.

The question was ruled out of order as inopportune at the time, but those who were in favour of its introduction would have been not a little astonished if the invitation of Agnostic, Theistic, or Trinitarian guests could have affected their course of action one way or the other.

But why I am writing this is that I and some others may distinctly understand whereto this new doctrine of "width" is leading us. Is it meant to embrace "Unitarian" ministers in the widest sense of that term, whether they profess or reject the profession of Christianity, so that if—let us say—and putting it as extravagantly as we will—any congregation whose name appears on the roll of the "Essex Hall Year Book," or sending a representative to the Conference, chooses to elect a Jew, Mohammedan, Swedenborgian, or even Mormon, resting his demand for domestic latitudinarianism on the tenets and sanction of the Old Testament, his claim on the Sustentation Fund, administered by very liberal managers, may be now entertained and met?

There is just one other question I would ask if you will kindly permit me to do so. Is the centre of our church life to be now removed from the B. and F.U.A. to the Triennial Conference, and is this latter no longer to be considered receptive, consultative, and suggestive only, but administrative as well? I. M. WADE.

[THIS "new doctrine of width," of which Mr. Wade speaks, is as old as the foundation of our Free Churches, but it is faced now by a new problem belonging to the condition of our present religious life. It will lead us, we should say, just so far as a helpful religious fellowship in our group of churches leads us. When one of our congregations has elected a Jew or a Mormon as its minister, it will be time enough to ask whether such a church can be retained in fellowship; but so far as the managers of the Sustentation Fund are concerned, they are, in our view, clearly right in the course they have adopted, taking the churches included in the Conference as the field of their operations, and asking, not as to the doctrine of the minister, but as to the religious life of the church. They cannot constitute themselves a court of theological inquisition; the Conference must determine the limits of its own fellowship. And for our own part, we certainly think that the spirit of Christian fellowship ought to include all worshippers of the Father, who desire to be included. The Christian testimony of our churches will be best maintained, not by a policy of inquisition and exclusion so long as the fundamental bond of union in the worship of God is faithfully maintained, but by a truer devotion on the part of all disciples to the spirit of Christian charity and a more living and persuasive witness to the power of Christian truth.—ED. INQ.]

THE DOCTRINE OF "KENOSIS."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to say that since I penned the review of Dr. Rashdall's important work on "Doctrine and Development" it has occurred to me (owing, I believe, to the recollection of a suggestion once made to me by Dr. Drummond) that I may have done the Apostle Paul an injustice in fathering upon him this doctrine of "Kenosis," which Dean Sabatier rightly calls "a semi-Pagan heresy." The passage in the Epistle to the Philippians indubitably proves that Paul's meaning is that it is Christ and not (as Dr. Rashdall alleges) God who "emptied himself." It is, however, quite possible, and even, I am now inclined to think, probable, that the Apostle was not thinking at all of any act by Christ anterior to his human birth; and that he simply used the expression "emptied himself" in a similar sense to that in which he shortly after used the expression "humbled himself." The leading idea, accordingly, in Paul's mind was that it is just the intense humility and self-forgetfulness of Christ's nature which is the clearest proof and manifestation of his intrinsic divinity. If this be so, all this "Kenotic" business, by needlessly entangling himself in which Dr. Rashdall has got into such hopeless inconsistencies, is not due to Paul at all, but to that very copious source of theological error—the ingenious speculations of unspiritual theologians.

SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

SIR,—I am desired by the Committee of the Sunday-school Association to ask you to allow me space to make known that arrangements are being made to hold a short Summer session at Oxford, in July next. The Professors of Manchester College, and other friends at Oxford, have cordially promised their co-operation and a friendly welcome to their visitors.

The session will probably last ten days, including two week-ends. Nothing definitely in respect to the proceedings has so far been settled, but it is suggested that arrangements should be made for a series of morning lectures, followed by a midday meal, which all members would be invited to attend. The afternoons would furnish opportunities for visiting the Colleges and other places of interest, and in the evenings it is proposed that meetings be arranged, when subjects of practical utility to Sunday-school teachers shall be introduced and discussed.

Later on a definite plan of proceedings, and of arrangements as to lodgings, will be made known through the Sunday-school correspondents; but it was thought advisable that, this being a new departure, as early a notice as possible of the proposed session should be given.

The Committee are aware that, owing to various circumstances, many teachers will be unable to attend, and they suggest that it would in some instances be possible for schools to send a delegate to represent them at Oxford, paying the expenses of the visitor, and in return receiving from him a report of what has taken place.

ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec.,
Sunday School Association.

THEODORE PARKER.

SIR,—In Frothingham's "Life of Theodore Parker," Chapter VIII., p. 171, there occurs the following:—"The Journal under date of Jan. 23, 1843, gives a full account (to be printed in 1899 as a memorial of the nineteenth century) of a meeting of the association at which Mr. Parker was present by particular request, for conference on matters of ecclesiastical concern."

May I ask you to do all in your power to have this valuable document brought to light, and with it, Parker's "Letter to the Boston Association of Congregational Ministers touching certain matters of their theology"? This letter has never been answered.

In these days of Traditional Theological wreckage, the publishing of the above would prove of priceless worth to free religious thinkers. Parker plowed his thought into the best of American life, and since his death his influence as a constructive religious thinker, has cleared and widened the intellectual horizon of all honest seekers of the truth.

CONGREGATIONAL CHRONICLES.

MR. E. BRAITHWAITE, of Nottingham, writes in reference to Mr. Hargrove's description of the Mill Hill Record, edited by the late Rev. Thomas Hincks, as having been "on a far more ambitious scale than is anywhere attempted now by a single church." Mr. Braithwaite says:—

"In January, 1872, when the Rev. R. A. Armstrong was minister here, he started The High Pavement Chronicle. It came out bi-monthly, and has been published uninterruptedly ever since. The first number, and the one for the current month, lie before me, and each contains sixteen pages. If anyone should ever write the History of our High Pavement Congregation, the Chronicle will supply him with a mass of valuable material."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL.

"CAPARISONS are odorous," as Mrs. Malaprop says, but the remembrance of our near neighbour, Manchester, with its girdle of thirty, or more, congregations whose thought is Unitarian, makes Liverpool and its district feel very limited. Yet the further remembrance of what Liverpool Unitarians have meant in the past and still mean, in the civic, philanthropic and social life of this majestic port, removes all sense of littleness, and fills one with legitimate pride and thankfulness. So it is no "chronicle of small beer" I have to pen.

First, as to the externals of our religious life in the way of church edifices. The rapid growth in modern times of our great cities, which is productive of so much disorganisation of the simpler life of our forefathers, presses very heavily on a small body like ours, possessing few places of worship, and those located in the heart of the city. As the members of our churches are forced year by year to suburbs increasingly remote, with limited Sunday trains or trams, the difficulty of regular attendance becomes very great. In Manchester this has resulted in the formation of new congregations within reach of groups of outlying Unitarians. In Liverpool and elsewhere the remedy is the bold removal of existing churches to more favourable neighbourhoods. As your readers probably know, the historic Renshaw-street Chapel, which is only five minutes' walk from Hope-street Church, is the religious home of many leading families resident far away, and some time ago it was decided that a new chapel should be erected in the Sefton Park district. This seems a very wise step. Hope-street Church remains to shelter all who reside in central and northerly districts, so no one need go adrift by the removal of the other congregation.

A few days ago I visited the new edifice, and was greatly impressed by its beauty, even in its incomplete state. It is roofed in, but floors and windows are yet absent. The exterior is of very striking design in red brick. The interior is lined throughout with red sandstone, and the coved ceiling is of beautiful woodwork. The noble chancel with its apsidal end, the ample choir well elevated, the wide nave to contain all the seats, and the aisles used simply for access to the pews—all combine to give great dignity and beauty. The date of opening is still uncertain.

Hope-street Church also has its building scheme in full progress in the shape of a Church Hall at the rear of the church. This is being erected in celebration of the bi-centenary of the congregation. The space is somewhat limited, but a useful and ornamental building will be added to the already beautiful architectural group.

At Liscard the new Chapel and Lecture Hall, the gift of Mrs. Elam in memory of her husband, is also making solid progress, and bids fair to be a handsome and somewhat original building. So much for brick and stone—whereby much faith and zeal are manifested.

Passing now to things spiritual, the first matter for great rejoicing is the return to partial work of our honoured and loved friend R. A. Armstrong, who has been laid aside for four months (besides previous absences) by a general breakdown. We have all missed his wise and impressive counsels and kindly companionship, and trust that he may soon be in full energy and strength. His return was signalled by the gift of a handsome silk gown. Let us hope he may live to wear it out in useful service.

For the last four months his pulpit has been filled by the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, who has won many friends, and whose preaching has, I am told, fully sustained his old reputation. It is far better in such a crisis to have a steady, continuous influence such as he can wield, rather than a kaleidoscopic variety of chance supplies.

In Mr. Armstrong's absence all the usual good work of the church has been loyally maintained, and in the rejoicing over his return a fresh wave of spiritual life and energy may well arise.

Mr. Jupp, since his advent at the Ancient Chapel, has taken his place also in our affection and esteem, and bids fair to fill that gap of universal usefulness which you, Mr. Editor, left when you removed. That venerable and quaint chapel has still a career before it in an unostentatious way, and could ill be spared.

The annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association, which was held on the 2nd inst. at Southport, was interesting and profitable. Right good it was to listen to the Rev. Chas. Hargrove, who always impresses one with a sense of his utter sincerity and simplicity of character and purpose, and who is a standing monument of what our plain Unitarian faith can do for a mind perplexed and tortured by Catholic dogma and ecclesiasticism. The annual report shows satisfactory work and progress in the assisted congregations of Liscard, Crewe, and Bootle, and a healthy tone pervaded the meeting. Under the auspices of this Association, a course of lectures will be commenced this week in Walton, a district lying between Bootle and Hamilton-road, in the hope of drawing attention to those centres. Dr. Klein (who, by the by, is filling Renshaw-street Chapel on Sunday evenings by his weighty lectures) opened the course with a stirring address on "Religion and the Sacerdotal Conception of it." A devotional service had prefaced the lecture, the singing being strikingly hearty and musical. Towards the end of the address applause involuntarily broke out, which was renewed again and again, giving a pleasing sensation to which we are unaccustomed when dealing with religious subjects. Everything points to an intense revival of interest in the greatest of all questions, and out of the seeming evil of the excesses of Ritualism a very real good is emerging. "Religion and the Protestant Conception of it" follows this week, and the course covers a well-conceived and systematic line of thought. The attendance filled nearly every seat.

No account of Liverpool would be complete without reference to our three Domestic Missions. That at Mill-street ranks only second to Hurst-street, Birmingham, in the multiplicity and success of its agencies; and the missionaries are kept at full stretch to cope with the crowds who gather in the noble buildings week by week. The mission is admirably aided by efficient workers from the leading congregations, though the constant cry is for more helpers.

Under Mr. Haigh, Hamilton-road chapel and school are becoming a centre of new life and usefulness, especially by drawing in crowds of the young people of the neighbourhood. Religion and wholesome recreation are wisely united, with classes for the thoughtful and home visitation for the sick and needy.

At Bond-street Mr. Morgan Whiteman carries on the old work, but the conditions of the neighbourhood have so changed that it is by no means impossible that some day it will seem wiser to concentrate the work at Hamilton-road.

All in all, there is considerable reason for buoyancy and confidence respecting our religious life and work in and around Liverpool. The darkest feature is the gradual loss from death, removal, and other causes, of some of the traditional families of wealth and influence, leaving a heavier burden on those of smaller means and less social weight. The days when a string of private carriages stood awaiting the close of service in Renshaw-street and Hope-street have passed away. The homely tram or homelier tramp now mark the change to democracy.

H. W. HAWKES.

UNITARIANISM IN AMERICA.

At a recent meeting of the Unitarian Club in Boston addresses were given on "The Forward Movement of Organised Liberalism." From these, as reported in the Christian Register, we take the following extracts. The first is from the address of the Rev. Charles E. St. John, of Pittsburg:—

"A great tide of the religious life is sweeping over this country, an intelligent and noble faith taking upon itself more and more an aspect of liberalism. It has come to be a grandeur of belief in God, a splendid certainty of the immortality of the human soul, a fine and loyal consciousness of the importance to every man of being a follower of Jesus Christ, a perception of the wonder of this beautiful and orderly world. It has come to be a religion which presses round about every man to make him fearless and cheerful in all the conditions of his existence. That religion will go on with increasing power, in this our land, whatever any individual or Church may do. That religion in its liberal aspect is having other supporters than ourselves. In every other Christian body are men who are preaching exactly what we preach, and putting a power into their advocacy of the essentials of Christian belief which cannot be rivalled in any period in the history of the Church. It would be easy for us to lie back and let the heaven work, and take no more trouble about it. Why do we not do it? For the simple reason that we are men, for the reason that we want to have a hand in what is going to lift soul after soul out of conditions that are low, into conditions that are glorious and beautiful. It will go on whether we help it or not; but, for our own sakes, we must have a share in the work. This tide flows on through willing human souls, and it cannot cease so long as one single soul is willing to help and advance the work."

The third address of the evening was by the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, and in the course of it he said:—

"I heard a campaign speech not long ago wherein the orator said, 'If the party is going to stay where it is, it has got to move forward!' That has some relation, perhaps, to the forward movement of Unitarianism. Surely, if we stand still, we stagnate. It is a maxim of the military art that the army which always stays inside its entrenchments is beaten already. There is demanded of us the constructive energy and the constructive spirit—the spirit that does not mistake restlessness for progress, or revolution for reform, or removal of landmarks for enlargement of territory.

"What, then, I ask, are the essential elements of the advance which we crave? I believe that the primary element is illustrated here to-night. Your Association believes that the primary thing in the success of a new Unitarian church is a consecrated personality.

each of those places just the very best man that can be found, believing that the power of that personality is what the cause first requires. And the more I become acquainted with the fellowship of Unitarian ministers who are to be the disciples, the evangelists, the apostles of our form of faith, the more I discover in this little band of men the power which may be as salt to keep the nation from corruption. And the more I have to do with this work of planting and founding Unitarian churches, the more I convince myself, and hope to convince others, that there is no more direct blow to be struck in this country for pure religion, for higher civilisation, for deeper patriotism, than is struck by those who found and maintain these centres of influence."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bedford.—Mr. T. Elliot (Highgate) and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards have recently preached here. On Tuesday evening a lecture (the second of a course) on "The Spanish-American War" was given by the minister's eldest son. The lecture was illustrated with lantern views. Mr. Goldstein provided lantern outfit and acted as lanternist.

Burnley.—Fortnightly services were held at the Burnley-lane Mission Room during the past year, and with the new year the Sunday-school began to meet morning and afternoon, instead of afternoon only. On Sunday, Feb. 5, the Rev. A. Gordon preached afternoon and evening. It is hoped that occasional evening services will be held during the year. On Thursday, Feb. 9, the annual business meeting was held, when addresses were given by the Rev. A. C. Smith and Mr. T. Lancaster. Mr. S. Sutcliffe was in the chair. We understand that the final consideration of the resignation by the Rev. A. C. Smith of the pulpit of the Trafalgar-street Church, will take place at a meeting of Church members on Thursday next.

Cirencester.—Mr. James Dancy acknowledges with thanks the receipt of two guineas from Mrs. Alfred Collier towards the debt for repairs.

Crewkerne.—By the gift of £50 by Mr. Blake, of Bridge, South Petherton, the sum required for the building of a schoolroom adjoining the chapel—about £200—has now been completed, and the work of erection will probably be commenced at an early date. The land for the site of the school is being given by Mr. E. J. Blake. The reseating of the chapel is contemplated.

Devonport.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith has accepted a temporary appointment at Christ Church.

Framlingham.—Mr. T. Elliot (Highgate) and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards have recently preached here. On Wednesday, the 8th inst., the annual "social" was held. Mrs. Brookes, Messrs. Dowling, Frost, and Sangster, and the members of the Sunday-school and drill-class contributed the programme of the meeting after tea.

Holywood, co. Down.—On the 10th inst. the Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., gave a public lecture in the Town Hall here on the "Music of Mendelssohn." Vocal and instrumental illustrations of this composer's work were given; and among those who contributed to this part of the programme were some of the best known and most talented musicians of Belfast. The lecturer spoke of Mendelssohn's personality, and showed how the character of the man was reflected in his music; also on the basis of the illustrations he explained some of the principles of musical art and composition. There was a large and appreciative audience, larger than the most sanguine estimate would have led us to expect. The result was highly satisfactory; and the proceeds have been devoted to the congregational fund.

London: Hackney.—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., recently of Trowbridge, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the New Gravel Pit Church, in succession to the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, and entered on the ministry last Sunday.

London: Little Portland-street.—A letter has been received from the minister, the Rev. Henry Rawlings, in which he resigns his position in the following words:—"I have decided to retire for a while from the regular work of the ministry, in the hope that by devoting myself to certain special studies, I may in due time make a contribution to the literature of rational religion." At a meeting of the congregation held on Sunday, Feb. 12, it was decided that this resignation should be accepted, with an expression of the congregation's deep regret.

Maerdy (Glam.)—The inhabitants of this quiet village have had the rare opportunity during the past two weeks of hearing two Unitarian ministers deliver lectures on subjects pertaining to religion, which were much appreciated by those present. On Monday evening, Feb. 6, Dr. Griffiths, Pontypridd, delivered a lecture on "The Bible and the People," and on Monday evening, Feb. 13, the Rev. D. Rees, Pentre, lectured on "The basis of Salvation." The audiences were not large, but thoroughly appreciative. At the close of Mr. Rees' lecture, several questions were asked by the treasurer of the local C. M. Church, which were answered to the satisfaction of the audience.

Manchester: Memorial Hall.—The annual meeting of the trustees was held on Friday, the 10th inst. In addition to the accommodation provided for the work of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, it was found that, by a variety of institutions, the rooms had been used 136 times without charge. A grant of £30 was made to the Unitarian Free Church at Pendleton towards the extinction of the debt on their recent extensions of buildings, and £10 to the congregation at Flagg. Other applications were reluctantly declined, owing to the state of the funds and the contemplated lighting of the hall by electricity. The Chairman was instructed to forward to Mr. James R. Beard a letter assuring him of the sympathy felt for him by his co-trustees during his prolonged illness, and the sincere satisfaction with which they learn that he is now improving in health. An executive committee was appointed, and after the transaction of other business, the trustees and their guests dined at the Reform Club, under the presidency of Mr. A. E. Steinthal. Invitations had been sent to the Revs. Alex. Gordon, J. E. Manning, C. T. Poynting, S. A. Steinthal, H. E. Dowson, Dr. Vance Smith, J. Collins Odgers, J. Pearson, W. E. George, and to Messrs. A. W. Worthington, F. D. Dunkerley, Richard Wade, Thomas Rawson, W. M. Shipman, John S. Harding, E. J. Wortley, Gilbert Beard, Edward Talbot, and E. W. Marshall, of whom seven were unable, from various causes, to be present. In the course of the evening Mr. H. Rawson read some notes which he had prepared on the foundation and history of the Memorial Hall, which, at the request of the trustees, are to be printed.

Manchester: Moss Side.—Seven years ago the present building was opened, and there is now an immediate prospect of the erection of a separate church building. The Rev. C. Roper announced at a special meeting of the congregation on Sunday, Jan. 29, that a generous friend had offered from £3,000 to £4,000 towards the cost of church, organ, &c., on condition that the congregation raised another £2,000. Of this £1,500, including the £350 already in hand, has been promised without any special canvass, and the congregation hope to raise the whole amount without a bazaar or any public appeal.

Newton Abbot.—Last Sunday an address was given by the Rev. F. T. Reed, in the Public Rooms, on "The True Basis of Religion"; to-morrow (Sunday) he will preach again, his subject being "What think ye of Christ?" A friendly notice (the first of its kind) appears in a local paper, concluding that "there is a fair future in store for the Unitarians in Newton Abbot." It seems that the late Dr. Barum, who resided in the neighbourhood for many years, provided as a place of worship what is now known as the "Public Rooms." The building changed hands in the course of time, but now the good seed sown in former days is bearing fruit.

Nottingham: Christ Church (Appointment).

—The Rev. W. Lindsay, the son of an Irish clergyman, and formerly minister of the American Episcopal Church, has accepted an invitation to the Christ Church pulpit, and enters on his duties to-morrow (Sunday). Mr. Lindsay, we may add, is brother-in-law to the Rev. F. A. Homer, of West Bromwich.

Oldbury.—The annual festival of the Guild of the Good Shepherd was held on Monday, Feb. 13. Eighty-six sat down to tea, and there were fifty-eight communicants; two new members were admitted. The Rev. E. P. Hall was to have given the Communion address, but was baffled by the very stormy weather in his attempt to reach Oldbury. The warden, the Rev. Henry McKean, conducted the whole of the service. The Guild meets once a month, and well maintains its efficiency.

Plymouth.—The Rev. Priestley Prime, of Torquay, delivered a very interesting and instructive lecture on "Nonconformity in Devon and Cornwall," in Treville-street Chapel, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 8. Questions were asked after the lecture, and a hearty vote of thanks was awarded to Mr. Prime. The audience, though small, was thoroughly appreciative.

Portsmouth.—On Sunday last the Rev. Wm. Birks who was preaching at the High-street Unitarian Chapel in the morning, and at the General Baptist Chapel in the evening, was asked to give the address at the afternoon service in the Commercial-road Baptist (Orthodox) Chapel, Landport. He was most cordially received (in place of Mr. Bond), and had a large and appreciative congregation. This is the first time, we believe, that a Unitarian minister has had the opportunity afforded him in Portsmouth of preaching from an Orthodox pulpit at a Sunday service.

Preston.—The annual meeting of this congregation was held on Sunday evening last, when the treasurer presented his balance-sheet for the year ending Jan. 31. On each of the chapel account, the Sunday-school account, and the choir fund account a small credit balance was shown. There is an endowment in connection with the chapel, consisting of freehold properties, now bringing in a net rental of just over £100. The most important part of this property had become a few years ago very dilapidated on account of its extreme age and unsuitability to modern demands, and was of very little help to the chapel funds. With praiseworthy zeal the congregation set to work to rebuild the property; and now the rebuilding having been paid for, the congregation as a set off against future depreciation and dilapidation are setting aside a yearly sum of £10 to accumulate for the benefit of their successors. During the last few months a considerable amount of interest has been aroused in the town by a series of sermons preached in the chief Roman Catholic church by the Professor of Philosophy at Stonyhurst College on the "Deity of Christ," which called forth a series of six sermons in reply by the Rev. Joseph Harrison, our minister. Large congregations testified to the interest taken in the subject by persons not attendants at the chapel, and the sermons being well reported in a local newspaper reached a much larger number than the actual hearers, and they appear to have made a very favourable impression, which it is hoped will benefit the cause of Unitarianism in Preston.

Ramsgate.—Mr. P. Bond conducted the service last Sunday, giving an address on "The Unseen World."

Reading.—The annual church meeting was held on Sunday evening, 29th ult., Mrs. Bailey being in the chair. The report of the Committee was encouraging, a debit balance of £71 having been reduced to £30 by the efforts of the congregation during the year. Alluding to recent comments on the action of the Sustentation Fund, the report says:—"This church has little concern with critical or speculative opinions so long as they are not dogmatically held. It chiefly asks that its minister will aid it in the search for higher truth and in the aspiration for a purer life; and it believes that in this it has maintained the best traditions of Unitarianism." After the transaction of the routine business, the meeting was addressed by the Rev. E. A. Voysey and others, and there was some discussion of plans for bringing the church into closer touch with the growing population of the town.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual business meeting of the congregation was held on Thursday, Feb. 9, when the annual report and accounts were approved. A vote of thanks was passed to the Committee for their services during the past two years, and the Committee for the next two years was appointed, including the Rev. J. E. Manning. The report drew attention to the satisfactory state of the funds, there being a balance of £54 in hand instead of the adverse balance of £87 with which the year had commenced. The late Mr. Bramley had left £250, the income of which was to be paid to the minister in augmentation of his salary. The various institutions of the congregation were reported in a satisfactory condition. It is hoped that some special memorial windows will soon be placed in the chapel, and a member of the congregation has offered to fill in the rest of the ground floor windows with antique or cathedral glass.

Stalybridge.—The annual party was held on Saturday last, and was well attended. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. James Jackson, chapel warden, who reminded the meeting that the congregation had a big work on hand in the raising of £800 by a bazaar, to make some needful alterations and enlargements in the church. They were all aware that their minister, the Rev. W. Harrison, was out of health and needed rest and change, and the Committee had granted him leave of absence to visit Egypt and Palestine. The congregation would be compensated for the loss of his services by what he would have to tell them on his return. The Rev. W. Harrison read interesting letters from the Revs. S. A. Steintal and Charles Roper, who had been invited to attend. He said from all he could hear he had no doubt they would raise the £800 by next October. After more than ten years' work among them he felt that he must take a complete rest and change, and he had been warned that if he did not take it, a breakdown would be the result. But even apart from that a visit to Palestine was an immense advantage to a minister. He thanked them for giving him leave of absence, and hoped when he returned he should be better able to carry on the work he loved. The Rev. H. E. Dowson congratulated the congregation on the fact that their minister was going to visit the Holy Land, and from what they knew of him he would have much to tell them when he returned. He had had Mr. Harrison for a brother for twenty years in the East Cheshire district, and always found him ready to give willing help to him personally, and to assist in promoting their common cause.

Swansea (Appointment).—The Rev. W. T. Jones, formerly of the Calvinistic Methodist Church of Wales, has received and accepted an invitation to the ministry of the High-street Church.

Walsley.—The annual congregational tea party and entertainment took place last Saturday, and was largely attended. The entertainment consisted of glee, songs, the Trial Scene from The Merchant of Venice, and a farce entitled Boots at the Swan. It was very satisfactory to see Shakespeare highly appreciated by the large audience, and Boots at the Swan was presented in a manner which produced an hour's continuous merriment.

West Bromwich.—On Saturday night the third public prize distribution in connection with the Lodge-road Sunday-schools was held in the school-room, when Mr. A. Underhill presided over a good attendance. The Chairman, the Rev. F. A. Homer, and Mr. J. J. Bowater, delivered short addresses, in which they spoke with gratification of the highly satisfactory position of the Sunday-school, and of the work being accomplished in connection with it. The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Mr. W. S. Watts presiding over a fair attendance. A resolution of condolence with the family of the late Mr. Frederick Ryland, and placing on record the church's appreciation of Mr. Ryland's work in connection with advanced education in West Bromwich and of his liberality and services to the cause of Liberal Christianity, was adopted. The financial statement showed a need of increased help to carry on the work of the church. The officers for the year were subsequently elected.

THE LIFE OF HENRY MORLEY, LL.D.,

Professor of English at University College, London.

BY

HENRY SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD. 1898. Price 12s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Speaker.—"Professor Morley, the author and lecturer, would be in any case a person worth reading about. Henry Morley, the man, large in heart and brain, is, perhaps, still more worthy of our attention. . . . Mr. Solly's 'Life' ought to be bought by public libraries, presented by rich men to ministers of religion, and read by all who love English morals and English literature."

The Athenæum.—"Henry Morley's life was busy and full of interest. . . . amazingly successful if tested by the true tests of success. Morley won a unique position among the scholars and teachers of our day."

The Academy.—"Mr. Solly . . . lets his subject speak for himself, in letter or diary, where these are available; but he has devoted thought to the selection of his material, and the arrangement of it was to present a real portrait."

The Scotsman.—"A well-filled volume of some 400 pages . . . it will at once be welcomed among books of its class . . . to those who would know the real worth of the man, much as he was known to his family, a reading of this excellent biography is indispensable."

Daily Chronicle.—"Not one man in a thousand would have won his way upward from such a quagmire of early troubles. . . . Mr. Solly has done his work well. This biography of his father-in-law is admirably written, in good taste, and with plenty of relief."

Daily Mail.—"An entirely satisfactory and eminently readable biography of a most lovable personality."

Manchester Guardian.—"There is always something fascinating to the student of human nature in the biography of a man who has in him the true instinct of the fighter, who begins life with tremendous odds against him, proceeds straightway to gird his loins for the fray, and after years of conflict emerges victorious. Henry Morley was essentially such a man."

Standard.—"The 'Life of Henry Morley' . . . has an interest of its own."

The Liverpool Post.—"Very well written."

Inquirer.—"This story of his life is sure of a most cordial welcome."

The Literary World.—"Mr. Solly has done his work well, and puts before us a strong and vivid portrait of a man of marked character, of considerable genius, and, above all, of indomitable pluck and perseverance. The story of Morley's struggles to make an income, and to break down the family opposition to his marriage with the woman of his choice, is reading of a very heartening sort."

Birmingham Post.—"The latter part of this biography, recording Professor Morley's work as a man of letters, is the more important; the former, detailing his fight with circumstances, is the more fascinating."

The Leeds Mercury.—"An admirable full-length portrait of a good man."

The Westminster Gazette.—"His life was well worth writing. . . . The personality revealed by his biographer is a singularly attractive one—generous, full of humour, the very soul of honour, 'a teacher of truth, of righteousness, and of love.' Mr. Solly shows admirable taste and discretion throughout his book."

Publishers' Circular.—"Among the countless students who have felt the influence of his teaching as lecturer and professor, the work is certain of a cordial welcome."

Isle of Wight County Press.—"To Mr. Solly nothing but the highest praise can be accorded for the manner in which he has accomplished his work; neither author nor editor, he has struck the happiest medium, and given us a volume which charms from its earliest pages, and in which the characters live and move before us right on to the end of the chapter."

Independent.—"Shows us how this well-equipped, self-sacrificing, and influential teacher was himself taught. Henry Morley won his wisdom by hard and bitter toil. The story of his life, as now set forth, is as interesting as were his methods of instruction; it will appeal to all whose happy privilege it was to be brought into direct contact with him, and to all who became acquainted with his work through the medium of the printed pages."

Daily News.—"Few memoirs more interesting have made their appearance in recent times."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE sudden death last week of the President of the French Republic was happily not followed by any political crisis. The Congress met on Saturday at Versailles, and by an unmistakable majority, elected M. Loubet, a moderate Republican, who had been President of the Senate, to the vacant post. The message of the new President to Parliament made an excellent impression. "Passionately attached," he said, "to the principles of the French Revolution and the régime of Liberty, I shall make it my first and constant thought to assist Parliament in the necessary work of tolerance and concord. . . . France, sure of herself, will be able to set calmly about the task of solving the problems which interrupt the moral and material well-being of her citizens, and to continue her peaceful and fruitful work in the field of thought, of science and art, as well as in that of economic labour in all its forms—agriculture, commerce, industry. Let us be more just to ourselves, and let us not allow it to be forgotten that our France has always proposed the same love of progress, justice, and humanity." As we read these measured and dignified words, "Dreyfus, Dreyfus" is still ringing in our ears, and we can only trust that the new President may develop such resources of moral power as may save his country from any further aggravation of that indelible disgrace.

A SERMON by Dr. E. Everett Hale on "Peace on Earth" appears in the New York Messiah Pulpit of Feb. 3. Dealing with the subject of the Peace Conference, Dr. Hale says that the proposal recalls the "Great Design" of Henri Quatre and Sully and Elizabeth and Burleigh :—

"Successful at every point, Henry, at the head of France, proposed the 'Great Design.' It was a design by which the fifteen states of Europe should unite in one permanent council for the mutual preservation of peace. I never heard any one say that Henry swung on rainbows or played with fancies. Men say he is the greatest monarch of three centuries, Frederic and Napoleon not excepted. I do not hear men call his minister Sully a dreamer or a lazy poet. Rather I hear him called the first statesman of five centuries. These men prepared the 'Great Design.' They submitted it to Elizabeth just after she had crushed the Armada. She and her ministers, such men as Burleigh and Walsingham, agreed to it, and improved it. They proposed it to the other states of Europe, with the eloquence of sovereigns who had armaments behind them. All but one of these states fell into the 'Great Design.' Yes, and Henry was no such dreamer, but he meant to compel by force the Emperor of Germany to fall into line with the rest. It was at that moment that tyranny and bigotry used their one weapon, and the dagger of Ravallac pierced the heart which was throbbing with the hope of universal peace for Europe. It is not amiss to go back three centuries to learn that a design like this is not unfamiliar to statesmen and to soldiers."

THE United States have shown, as Dr. Hale points out, what may be done through the recognition of a supreme tribunal to hold in peaceful union States different in origin, in interests, in education and religion :—"It is an example of authority to examine and to decide the questions which arise between so many States, stretching from ocean to ocean, among men of every pursuit and of different interests and all religions. Thus has the supreme tribunal of America shown to the world what is possible in maintaining the peace of 'the United States of America.' With this object-lesson, we are able to make a step forward, which shall lead to what Henry IV. called 'the United States of Europe,' and to what we will yet call, not the United States of Europe, but the 'United States of Christendom.' And as Christian men and women, as we read every prophecy of the past, we have a right to look forward with the eye of those who believe that the good God made of one blood 'all races of men.' We see the prophecy of the past accomplishing itself more and more distinctly, as every year comes forward of what we now call the future. More and more confidently do we thank God that our children, if not we ourselves, shall live in the century

Where the common sense of most shall hold a fretful world in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapped in Universal Law.

Earth, wise from out the foolish past,
Shall peradventure hail at last
The advent of that morn divine,
When nations shall like forests grow,
Wherein the oak hates not the pine,
Nor birches wish the cedars woe ;
But all in their unlikeness blend,
Confederate to one golden end."

THE beneficent work of Dr. and Mrs. Raynolds, the American missionaries at Van, in Armenia, is being carried on under great difficulties and with wonderful devotion. Since the massacre of 1896, the work of the Industrial Bureau has been steadily developed, so that by its instrumentality at the end of last year 7,200 souls were being maintained, and 50 more orphans had been received into the Orphanage, bringing the total up to 400. And still the need is limitless, and in the surrounding villages the suffering is very great from lack of food and the unrestrained ravages of the Kurds. In two villages, not far off, it is reckoned that 78 of the people have died of starvation. Both the "Friends of Armenia" (47, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W.) and the Women's Armenian Relief Fund (treasurer, Mrs. Madeleine Cole, 1, Trebovir-road, Earl Court, S.W.) appeal for further help, most sorely needed, for the Orphanage and industrial relief work. The Committee of the latter fund spent last year over £1,500 in that work. £5 is needed to support a child for one year, and, as a rule, a child should stay at least three years in the Orphanage.

DR. WALDEMAR BELCK, a German savant, whilst collecting cuneiform inscriptions in the province of Van last autumn, was shot down and robbed by the Kurds. Only his presence of mind and skill in feigning death after the first shot saved his life. He and his friend Dr. Lehmann subsequently spent three months with Dr. and Mrs. Raynolds at Van, and they sent on Jan. 7 a most interesting account of the work of the orphanage to the secretary of the Women's Armenian Relief Fund. Dr. Raynolds has shown great ingenuity and resource in adapting and extending the premises of the mission to meet the new demands of the Orphanage. For instance, the large oven, which is kept almost constantly at work, baking bread for the whole establishment and feeding a large number outside, has a reservoir placed over it, which thus furnishes a constant supply of hot water, for washing the clothes of the four hundred, and for a bath for successive companies of the boys and girls. There is a weaving shop with eight hand looms, where forty-three boys are learning to weave, the yarn being supplied by women connected with the Industrial Bureau. Other children are taught tailoring and shoe-making, and last summer, instead of continuing to buy leather, a tannery was started. There is also a carpenter's shop, and another department in charge of an ingenious copper-smith. The discipline and economy are described as exemplary, while intellectual and religious instruction goes hand in hand with the industrial training.

THE sixty-ninth anniversary of the Brahmo Somaj was celebrated at Calcutta by the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj in a succession of meetings. After five days of preparation, prayers were offered on Jan. 19 in Brahmo households for the welfare of the Brahmo Somaj, and on the evening of the following day the opening service was held in the Mandir of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj. At 5.30 an address was delivered by the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, which was followed by the opening service and a sermon by Pandit Sivanath Sastri, M.A. On Saturday and Sunday, Jan. 21 and 22, special services were also held, Mr. Williams preaching a sermon on Sunday morning; and the annual meeting of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj was held in the afternoon, Mr. A. M. Bose, M.A., presiding. The address of the new president, Mr. R. N. Ray, who was unable to be present, was read to the meeting, and is printed as a supplement to the Indian Messenger of Jan. 29. A cordial welcome was given to Mr. Williams, who responded. Tuesday, Jan. 24, was the actual anniversary of the founding of the Brahmo Somaj, and worshippers began to assemble in the Mandir as early as 3 A.M., so that by day-break the hall was quite full. Hymns were sung from about 4 A.M. till 7, when the morning service commenced. The sermon was preached by Pandit Sivanath Sastri. The festival was continued for several days longer.

In a recent letter to the Chairman of the Leicestershire Congregational Union, on the subject of the Church and boys, the Bishop of London wrote:—

You ask me a question which is perpetually before the mind of all workers for Christ. The fact is that we have the boys in hand during the school period, then we lose them, and have to pick them up again with difficulty. I do not want to go into controversial matters, but I increasingly feel that if the aim of secular education is to hand on a boy to continuation or technical classes, the aim of religious education ought to be to attach him definitely to some Christian organisation, which should care for him. This method of care should be better adapted to its purpose. We need boys' clubs attached to every church, into which boys leaving school and going to work should be naturally drafted. These clubs ought to be organised with a view to the actual facts of boys' life, and ought not to make at first too great demands on their spiritual powers, which require special training during the period of transition from the discipline of school to almost complete freedom. We have not yet thought this out sufficiently with reference to human nature.

THE Committee of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, having asked the opinion of their minister with reference to the new Nonconformists' Marriage Act, the Rev.

R. A. Armstrong made the following statement, which we are glad to be able to reproduce here:—

"I do not wish to become 'an authorised person' under the recent Marriage Act for the following reasons among others:— I have had, in Ireland, the experience of being my own registrar at marriages. I found the responsibility for legal forms and technicalities exceedingly distracting. My desire is to be able to concentrate my attention on the religious side of the occasion; and by having my own mind full of that to make it felt by the bride and bridegroom and their friends. The occasion is unique in life, and a minister's mind ought not to be drawn off to legal formalities. The presence of the Registrar has always been to me a very real and important relief. Secondly, I regard the Act as in no way adjusting the balance of equality between members of the Establishment and Nonconformists. It permits the Nonconformist minister, as a concession, to do the Registrar's work, but the Registrar is still to have the fees—sixpence being the sum granted to the Nonconformist minister by the State for a copy of the register, while he is liable to two years' penal servitude if he fail in providing this. I have no desire for the sixpence or for the liability to penal servitude. I regard the Act as adding insult to injury in what it offers to Nonconformists."

WE omitted last week to correct a slip in Mr. Hawkes's Provincial Letter from Liverpool. The Church Hall, which is being erected at the rear of Hope-street Church, is to commemorate not the bi-centenary but the jubilee of the present church, which was opened in 1849, during the ministry of the Rev. James Martineau. The bi-centenary of the congregation falls in 1907, its first chapel in Key-street having been opened in 1707. The congregation moved in 1791 to Paradise-street Chapel, during the ministry of the Rev. John Yates, and there Dr. Martineau preached from 1832 until the removal to Hope-street as above noted. The congregation of Renshaw-street Chapel, which is about to move out to Sefton Park, dates back to about 1688, having removed from its first chapel in Castle Hey to Benn's-garden in 1727, and in 1811 to the present Renshaw-street Chapel. But the patriarch of all is the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, first built about the year 1618, and still occupying the old site.

ANOTHER former hearer of the late Rev. Thomas Hincks sends us the following note:—

"The interesting notice by a correspondent in THE INQUIRER, of Feb. 11, of two sermons preached by the late Rev. Thomas Hincks in York, sixty years since, impels me to record in your journal, if I may, the equally strong impression made on me by Mr. Hincks when, my first decade but just completed, I first heard him preach, many a long year ago, 'Faith without work is dead' the text of his discourse. Frequently after this I was privileged to hear him again, each time with an increasing measure of the same feeling as before. In one of his later sermons, I remember his remark (à propos of I forget now what) that one could not 'define the perfume of a primrose in a proposition.' So was it with himself, and if ever I try to satisfy myself by saying that it was by such-and-such a quality or combination of qualities that he produced on his hearers the effect which he undoubtedly did, I am baffled, and there still remains something unsaid; for it was not only by his rare gift of choicest language, nor yet by the chastened feeling and vigorous thought which characterised his every discourse, nor yet only by the unconscious air of distinction which he bore, and the fine lineaments of his intellectual face that, as a preacher, he reached the hearts of those who heard him. Beyond and above all these a hidden and unseen fire burnt within him as he spoke, whence kindled I will not ask, but which was potent to awaken enthusiasm in the breasts of young and old, and to conduct his hearers, as by some beacon light, into the inmost presence of the Most High."

INTIMATIONS.

"I thought the universe was thrill'd with love."—From Dante's "Inferno."

WHEN o'er the tender grasses of the spring
I see the sunlit raindrops shimmering,
And by the blossom-burden'd hedge-rows
pause,
Not asking Nature's purpose, scheme, and cause,
But simply satisfied to draw my breath
In the moist air, which from apparent death Enkindles life in meadow, field, and grove,
I dream the universe is thrill'd with love.

When day by day as through the world I fare,
Not wholly ignorant of doubt and care,
And catch a smile still brave and confident
On features blanch'd by failure, toil, and want,
Or notice in some joyless city street
Bright baby-faces, innocent and sweet,
That soften hearts no other means could move,
I know the universe is thrill'd with love.

For beauty, trust, and joy are not the gift
Of one who set our yearning souls adrift,
Pilotless, in the sea of circumstance,
To steer their way, and some to port—by chance!
But all are tokens of a power divine
Which made the flower to bloom, the sun to shine,
And gave the child its happy heart to prove That earth is thrill'd with her Creator's love. LAURA G. ACKROYD.

AMONG the many half-pagan legends that were connected with Ireland during the Middle Ages, one of the most beautiful is that of the islands of life and of death. In a certain lake of Munster, it is said, there were two islands; into the first death could never enter, but age and sickness, and the weariness of life, and the paroxysms of fearful suffering were all known there, and they did their work, till the inhabitants, tired of their immortality, learned to look upon the opposite island as upon a haven of repose: they launched their barks upon its gloomy waters, they touched its shore, and they were at rest.—Camden, quoted in Lecky's "European Morals."

JEREMY TAYLOR, AND THE GOLDEN GROVE.—II.

THE "Golden Grove" itself is a book somewhat curiously divided. Since one of its chief ends was to serve in the building up of the younger generation in the knowledge of the Christian faith, the book naturally opens with a section called "Things to be Believed." Here we have an outline of the Orthodox faith, as held by the ordinary Protestant, closing with a paraphrase of the Apostles' Creed. We realise the importance which this part of his manual would have in Taylor's eyes, especially when we read passages from his quaint "Address to the Pious and Devout Reader," which opens the book. There we find him lamenting that "in this sad declension of Religion, the seers who are appointed to be the watchmen of the Church cannot but observe that the supplanters and underminers are gone out, and are digging down the foundations; and, having destroyed all public forms of Ecclesiastical Government, discountenanced an excellent Liturgy, taken off the hinges of Unity, disgraced the Articles of Religion, polluted public assemblies, taken away all cognisance of Schism, by mingling all Sects, there is now nothing left, but that we take care that men be Christians," and "that the young men who were born in the Captivity be taught how to worship the God of Israel after the manner of their forefathers, till it shall please God that Religion shall return into the land, and dwell safely, and grow prosperously." So in order to make Christians, and prevent "the people from falling under the harrows and saws of impertinent and ignorant preachers who think all religion is a sermon, and expound chapters that the meaning may never be understood, and pray that they may be thought able to talk but not to hold their peace"—Jeremy has great faith in the Apostles' Creed, emphasises and enlarges upon it, and so spends some forty pages of his book, authorising his action by the words of Augustine: "This is the faith which in few words is given to novices: these few words are known to all the faithful: that by believing they may be subject to God; by this subjection they may live well; by living well they may purify their hearts; and with pure hearts they may understand what they do believe."

But it will undoubtedly be the further parts of the book which will be found most useful and helpful in the life of the modern. The average person, whatever Church he belongs to, finds the explanation of long creeds a tedious affair, and passes on to things of greater interest. Such things he will find in the second part of the "Golden Grove." It is called "Things to be done." And first Taylor reminds us of the value of each day in the building up of a life, that a fresh cell is added to the structure of character perpetually being raised, and therefore we should try to begin each day with something of a consecration. "Suppose every day to be a day of business; for your whole life is a race, and a battle—a merchandise, and a journey. Every day propound to yourself a Rosary or a Chaplet of good works to be presented to God at night." This strikes the chief note of the book—the ancient injunction that whatsoever is done shall be done for the glory of God. Then follow a series of the rules every reader of devotional books is familiar with: rules for private prayers to accompany all the common and necessary acts of life, brief words that are to lift our petty actions into symbols of Christian life. From the moment of waking on our bed, through the duties of rising, dressing, breakfasting, and the rest, right on to the last moments of the day, everything is to be consciously brought into relation with religion. As Taylor says: "Religion must not only be the garment of your soul to invest it all over; but it must be also as the fringes to every one of your actions, that something of religion appear in every one of them, besides the innocence of all of them." It is beautiful advice, and perhaps for a few rare souls may be practicable; but for most of the busy men and women of to-day it must seem a counsel of perfection, with so little hope of it being realised. The essential of it, however—the act of prayer—that at least is the daily fact in every devout life: the practice which gives a strength, as of some invisible spiritual force, to be perpetually, though not always consciously, asserting itself. And for help in the form and most needful parts of daily prayer, as experienced in most lives, he shapes the order of our prayers, suggesting that they should begin with an Act of Adoration, then pass naturally to Thanksgiving, Self-Consecration (as our best sign of gratitude), Confession, Petition (which should by no means constitute the chief portion of prayer), and Intercession. Of the value of prayer in the daily course of life Taylor is never tired of speaking, though he knows well enough that prayer must not be made a substitute for duties, that we must not expect prayers to work miracles, when the thing we pray for is something we ourselves could achieve or gain. He puts the old sentence "The gods help those who help themselves" into other language when he says "Remember that you are bound to do all those duties, for the doing of which you have prayed for the divine assistance." So he would have a man suit his prayers to his needs, and himself to his prayers, so that there should be a harmony in the whole life.

There is something so sane and sensible about Taylor's injunctions for the happy use of the daily life. The whole household of the Christian family is busy in work of some kind: "Let there be no idle person in or about your family"; and when the definitely worshipping act is to be carried out it is to be with thoroughness and reality—the prayers, as we have seen, are to be such as are natural to the lives uttering them, and the meditations, or readings, of the Bible are to be wisely chosen. One remembers Ruskin's youthful experiences, how he was made steadily to go through certain books, "the whole of Leviticus, hard names and all"; and it is good to find a compeer of the Commonwealth Puritans advocating a "Bible for home reading" such as Montefiore is giving our generation—a Bible in which only the really helpful and inspiring passages shall be dwelt upon, "such portions as contain the precepts of holy life," while "the less useful part" may be read at "leisure" (whenever that may be). Then, too, it is a wise caution he gives as to the manner of reading. Doubtless many of us would gain far more from our Bibles were we to read less at a time, but study to get the kernel of our reading as Jeremy advises. "Read not much at a time; but meditate as much as your time and capacity will give you leave; ever remembering that little reading and much thinking; little speaking and much hearing; frequent and short prayers, and great devotion, is the best way to be wise, to be holy, to be devout." And when we are reading not so much for the purpose of instruction, as with the desire of spiritual awakening and enlightenment, we could not be better encouraged than by his words: "Be sure to meditate so long, till you make some act of piety upon the occasion of what you meditate; either that you get some new arguments against a sin, or some new encouragements to virtue; some spiritual strength and advantage, or else some act of prayer to God, or glorification of Him."

Turning for a moment to the third division of the "Golden Grove," that called "Postulanda" (as distinguished from Credenda and Agenda), we have moving examples of Taylor's own prayers, beautifully and simply expressed, with far less exuberancy of phrase and fancy than would be found in "Holy Living and Dying." To give but one prayer, one from the series that paraphrase the Lord's Prayer, a paraphrase immeasurably superior in word and feeling to Wilson's, in his "Sacra Privata."

Merciful and Gracious Father; Thou gavest us being, raising us from nothing, to be an excellent creation; efforming us after Thine own image, tenderly feeding us, and conducting and strengthening us all our days. Thou art our Father by a more excellent mercy, adopting us in a new birth to become partakers of the inheritance of Jesus: Thou has given us the portion and the food of Sons, O make us to do the duty of Sons, that we may never lose our title to so glorious an inheritance. Let this excellent name and title be our glory and our confidence, the endearment of obedience, and the principle of a holy fear to Thee our Father, and of love to Thee and to our brethren. Unite every member of the Church to Thee in holy bands; let there be no more names of division, no titles and ensigns of error; let not us who are brethren contend, but in giving honour to each other, and glory to Thee, contending earnestly for the Faith, but not to the breach of charity, nor the denying each other's Hope; but grant that we may all join in the promotion of the honour of Thee, our Father. For ever let Thy Spirit witness to our spirit that we are Thy children, and enable us to cry, Abba, Father.

Of such prayers there are many in this third division of the book, making it a treasure in the library of devotional writings. Then the closing pages of the book are filled with hymns, beautiful in their own quaint Crashaw-and-Herbert-like way, but far enough removed from the possibility of congregational use. Only occasionally is the note of the sacred lyric heard as in the opening of the Advent hymn:—

When Lord, O when shall we
Our dear Salvation see?
Arise, arise,
Our fainting eyes
Have longed all night, and 'twas a long one too.

Taylor and his generation perhaps had but a small idea of singing during worship: what he wished to provide were prayers of adoration and aspiration in poetic metre. Though hymns, he says, "fitted to the fancy and devotion of the younger and pious persons," they are mainly "apt for memory, and to be joined to their other prayers." Not altogether a needless reminder for many who sing hymns nowadays, and often forget their use as prayers.

But, as has been already implied, the chief value of this book for most readers will lie in its second part. Fitly enough it is headed with a sub-title in my copy "Via pacis," for its meditations are of that high order which points to the way of peace. Quietness and calm are the essence of its pages: no one could read them and not feel this: and many would fancy they had met, at times, an Eastern spirit, for touches of a Buddhistic mysticism, self-abnegation, killing out of all desire, strains which run through all religions, meet one here and there.

"If all be well within, nothing can hurt us from without." . . . "He to whom all things are one, who draweth all things to one, and seeth all things in one, may enjoy true peace and rest of spirit." . . . "It is not much business that distracts any man, but the want of tendency towards God." . . . "As soon as ever a man desires anything inordinately, he is presently disquieted in himself." And Gautama himself might have said this: "To free yourselves of passions, is to lay the axe to the root of the tree, and the true way of peace." Counsels spring up in page after page in aphorisms worthy of Benjamin Whichcote, or George Herbert's "Jacula Prudentium." "Do no evil, for no interest, and to please no man, for no friendship, and for no fear." "God regards not how much we do, but from how much it proceeds. He does much that loves much." "Every man's virtue is best seen in adversity." "Beg not a long life, but a good one." "He that watches himself, will be willing to be silent concerning others." Sacramentalist as he is, Jeremy Taylor knows that spirit must underlie all form. "He that esteems his progress in religion to consist in exterior observances, his devotion will quickly be at an end."

This is the purpose of the "Golden Grove," to encourage and deepen the true spirit of religion, the soul's own sense of its kinship to God. Written from a time so desperate for his hopes, it is a sign-manual of Jeremy Taylor's beautiful nature. He had not vainly studied his "A Kempis" (whom at times he quotes almost literally): and we, who are taught to regard a Christian as one made so rather by divineness of life than by beliefs alone, may find many things in the "Golden Grove" to kindle and enrich our faith. With one such passage this article may fitly close, for it is filled with that first note I spoke of as the key to the whole book—Taylor's devotion to God:—"He is at peace, who is reconciled to God; and God loves him when he hath overcome himself; and all is well when nothing pleases him but God, being thankful in the midst of his afflictions; and he is holy, who, when he hath lost his comfort, loses nothing of his duty, but is still the same, when God changes His face towards him."

A HYBRID QUOTATION.

SIR,—If, as we are sometimes told, a misquotation ought to be nailed down at once, it should be pointed out that Mr. Hawkes is in error in ascribing to Mrs. Malaprop the saying, "comparisons are odorous." The quotation is in fact a hybrid. It is Mrs. Malaprop who talks about "comparisons," but it is Dogberry who says that "comparisons are odorous."

LITERATURE.

HENRY ROBERT REYNOLDS.*

THE volume containing the life and letters of the late Principal of Cheshunt College is a gracious tribute to the memory of a man whom to have known was to have loved, and who, though never very prominent in public affairs, exercised a singularly elevating influence over any society in which he moved, and over the students who were fortunate enough to study under his watchful care.

Dr. Reynolds' paternal grandfather, who had studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh, was a Fellow and Censor of the College of Physicians, and became Physician-in-Ordinary to George III. His father, who was educated at Westminster and Oriel College, Oxford, while in America as Attaché to the British Embassy, was attracted by the simplicity of the Quaker form of worship, and resolved to quit the Church of England. On his return to this country he joined the Congregational body, and accepted the Principalship of the Protestant Dissenters' Grammar School, at Leaf-square, Manchester, and became pastor of the adjoining church. After some subsequent years at Chester he removed to Romsey, in Hampshire, and here Henry Robert was born and reared amid home influences and natural surroundings, well-fitted to the requirements of a delicate body and hyper-sensitive mind. In his home he had also the privilege of seeing most of the leading men of the denomination, and listening to the stories of missionaries like Williams, Freeman, Moffat, and Morrison; so that it is not surprising that he grew up naturally into the idea of the ministry, and in 1841, at the age of sixteen, entered Coward College, London.

While at college, Henry Reynolds seems to have devoted a large amount of time to preaching, and when only twenty years of age, and with his college course not quite complete, he yielded to the solicitations of the church at Halstead, Essex, and became its pastor in 1846. After four years' labour, he reluctantly gave up this comparatively small church to undertake the important charge of East Parade Chapel, Leeds, and the letters of that period give much valuable testimony, as to the power for good exercised by so young a man in that great and busy commercial centre of the North of England.

But it was soon apparent that a north country climate was too trying for his delicate constitution; long intervals of rest and foreign travel yielded but temporary strength, and after ten years of pastoral work, greatly blessed in its results, Reynolds accepted the post of Principal of Cheshunt College, near London, which position he held until 1895. From the large number of published letters, written and received during this period, it is evident that the great power which Dr. Reynolds exercised over the men who passed under his care, lay in his personality. Himself loyal to, and enthusiastic for the principles of Christianity, he was in himself an illustration of these principles, and this it was which made him in class and lecture room, in the denomination to which he belonged, and amid a large and varied circle of friends, an impulse towards righteousness. His zeal for foreign missions was an inspiration which resulted in a large number of his students devoting themselves to the work, and among them we find the well-known names of Wardlaw Thompson, Chalmers of New Guinea, MacFarlane of Mongolia, Meech of China, and many others at present labouring in various parts of the mission field.

Along with his other gifts and graces, Dr. Reynolds possessed literary talents of a very high order. One of his first publications was an article in the British Quarterly Review on "Comte, his Religion and Philosophy," which attracted much notice in the newspapers, and of which George Henry Lewes, the translator and exponent of the Positive Philosophy in England, declared "that it was the first elaborate article yet written upon Auguste Comte." Among his publications were several volumes of sermons and a novel, "Yes or No." In 1865, in conjunction with Dr. Allon, he undertook the editorship of the British Quarterly Review in the place of Dr. Robert Vaughan.

The letters included in this volume are of great and varied interest. Among Dr. Reynolds' correspondents were Dr. Dale, R. H. Hutton, Cardinal Manning, Robert Collyer, the Hon. Roden Noel, Dr. Hook, and many others prominent in different religious connections. The volume is well edited, and leaves little more to be said in words about a man whose attractive qualities are abundantly testified by the number of his letters, treasured by disciples and friends in all quarters of the globe.

J. S. PATTINSON.

RECENT ASTRONOMY.*

THIS is a volume of the Victorian Era series. The six chapters of Dr. Fison's book deal in turn with the life of a star, the measurement of stellar distances, the Milky Way and the distribution of stars, the recent study of the planet Mars, the analysis of sunlight and starlight and the red flames of the sun. These are all treated with care and clearness, and the historical method is followed as far as possible. Without giving us too much ancient history, the author relates enough of the past to enable us to see recent advances in their proper setting, and to measure the stride.

To those whose present knowledge of astronomy is confined to an elementary acquaintance with the solar system, this little book will be a revelation of wonders. Every chapter teems with realities surpassing the extravagances of epic romance. So far, no star has been found to lie nearer to the solar system than alpha Centauri. A vague suggestion of the unthinkable void that separates us from even this, may perhaps be obtained from the fact that upon a scale which represented the earth's orbit by the circumference of a shilling, the star would be at a distance of two miles. The stars are suns, but if our sun were removed to the distance of the star Sirius it would fade into insignificance, only shining as a star of the third magnitude. The light of Sirius exceeds that of the sun by seventy-five times. The star Algol has a dark companion, which periodically eclipses a portion of its light, as the two bodies revolve round their common centre of gravity. It seems probable that the dark sister was once as bright and shining as the other, and its present condition "suggests the picture of the death-stage of a sun." The idea is that stars begin their life as bodies of glowing gas, becoming condensed by the gravitation of their own parts, and eventually burning out. The nebulous matter out of which they are formed may be discerned in many parts of the sky, and, although gauzy and cloud-like, may supply abundant material. The great nebula in Orion fills so vast a space that the whole of the solar system would be lost in it. It was thought for some years that all the nebulae were close congregations of stars, but it is now known that nearly half of them owe their luminosity to glowing gas. The appearance of our own sun is strongly suggestive of the view that its bright surface consists of incandescent clouds. "The sun is, in all probability, essentially an enormous bubble, enveloped in incandescent cloud"; it is parting with its heat by radiation, but may, perhaps, be gaining more through shrinkage, and it is impossible to say whether it has passed its greatest glory. "The fixed stars" are moving, and are not all seen in quite the same place as in former centuries; but the movement is not according to any system that can be discovered. Our own sun is believed to be travelling towards the star Vega.

The Milky Way is now regarded as a definite structure, its appearance not being due to perspective effect or to optical projection. It may also be our comparatively near neighbour in space, seeing that the brighter stars (which are probably the nearer ones) are closely associated with it. The planet Mars has commanded special attention in recent years, on account of a reticulation of lines which looked artificial, and were described by Schiaparelli as a "canal system." But with some of the most powerful telescopes they are not seen, and we cannot confidently base upon them any theory about the intelligent inhabitants of the red planet, and their gigantic irrigation works. The canals might be wanted, for the "seas" do not seem to exist; and they might be abstractly possible, for there is a polar snow-cap which melts in the summer; but it is scarcely credible that mere artificial structures should be visible across 50,000,000 miles of space.

Although this is a book of astronomy, half its chapters have a good deal to do with light and colour and the chemistry of gases. In no branch of investigation is it more clearly seen that the sciences go hand in hand in their progress. In describing the Milky Way, Dr. Fison had to speak of the triumphs of photography; he tells also of the wonderful achievements of the spectroscope.

While the study of astronomy is calculated, in some of its aspects, to be ennobling and inspiring, it seems liable, in another view, to prove depressing. "When I consider the heavens the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him?" We seem so insignificant! When we think of Sirius as seventy-five times greater than our Sun, we are humbled. When we consider that on a diagram which represented the nearest stars as two miles away the solar system would show no larger than a shilling, we are depressed. What would the earth be, and what importance can there be in human history, even from the dawn of time to the crack of doom? Dr. Fison recognises that the mere statement of the distances of stars is apt to be productive of weariness of the spirit. Tracing the process by which stars are born from nebulae, and live through their age of splendour and become dark, he anticipates a time when nothing but blackness and stillness will remain in the universe. At present "the physical universe is inexpressibly glorious; and it is scarcely possible that the contemplation of the decay of its activity should be unaccompanied by a touch of sadness." This is most true. But while we do not know enough to be able to predict with certainty so dark an end, may we not assert a priori that a universe which had no beginning cannot come to an end at all; that while some suns decay, new ones bud into life, keeping the tree of the universe ever green; and that if there was a beginning to such processes, there must have been a cause for it, adequate and purposive, and the same cause may operate again. Besides, that solar system on the scale of the circumference of a shilling is misleading. Size is but a relative thing, and nothing is really either large or small. Although on that diagram the earth is a speck not seen at all, the really considerable thing there existing is man, a being capable of looking before and after, "in understanding how like a god." He is so "infinite in faculties" that although confined in his physical peregrinations to one little planet, he has taken his celestial latitude and longitude, measured the spaces and weighed the worlds around him and afar off. He is not only of more value than many sparrows, but transcends the scale of planets themselves, and suns and stars which have no conscious life.

VERSES OF A HERETIC.*

NATURE has given to Mr. Hitchcock some of the gifts of a poet, but not all, and he should seriously consider whether he could not better employ those that he has than in writing verses. He has the gift of feeling strongly, and his sympathies are with the true, the beautiful, and the good. He has also an abundant flow of language, yet hardly a command of words, for the words too often seem the master of his thought rather than its servant. He is much too fond of alliteration, and often lets the wrong word stand because it begins with the same letter as several others in the line. This is an indication of his radical failing, which is an inability to realise when he has expressed his thought in language which will convey the same thought to the minds of his readers. Hence his poems are constantly obscure, and convey a sense of weakness, not of strength, in spite of the intensity of feeling which evidently lies behind them. This is the more noticeable because of the rapid changes of idea which he allows himself to utter without giving any indication of the connecting link in his own mind. Thus, "A Natal Chant" (p. 5) opens with a fine bold conception, but after the first few verses the metaphors become so mixed that we simply cannot understand what is meant. "A Wedding Chant" (p. 55) is poetic till we come to the fourth verse. What does Mr. Hitchcock mean by talking of God being "jealous of a love that soars beyond the comprehension of his soul?"

One of the best of the shorter poems is called "The Comedy":—

This king and priest, who boast that they have gained
The highest sphere where lordly loungers dwell,
Are food for worms and fire, for they've attained
Arrested evolution—that is, Hell.
Their willing churl, begrimed with sweat and soot,
A brute in most except his puny skill,
Atones the World, for he has set his foot
By Nature's on the Purgatorial Hill.
The foe of priest and rebel to the king,
Finding his proud self-consciousness suffice,
Although his time denies him everything,
Is throned upon the wealth of Paradise.

Several of the longer poems we began with hope but abandoned in despair, such as "Eastward at Nightfall," and "A Burial Chant." Our author's most rebellious mood is exhibited in "An Atheist's Sermon," and we certainly have no mind to defend the Bishops (and others) whom he attacks. Perhaps the best of the poems is the one called "Portland," which expresses the feelings of an Irish dynamiter sent to penal servitude. It contains true pathos, especially in the last verse:—

I'm very tired of all the world's commotion
Alone, without a friend to shake my hand
And whisper words to wake the old devotion
For all who love my race and mother land;
Alone, and wrecked on life's disastrous ocean,
Some day I shall escape the arrow-brand,
For though the world's unutterably dreary,
An endless sleep awaits the worn and weary.

The best advice we can give Mr. Hitchcock is contained in Newman's lines:—

Prune thou thy words, the thoughts control
That o'er thee swell and throng:
They will condense within thy soul,
And change to purpose strong.

If Mr. Hitchcock decides to go on writing verse, let him write more slowly, and be still more slow to publish, and not give his verses to the world till they are fit to convey his meaning. But he would be wiser and happier, we think, if he would be content to write and speak good prose, using his poetic talents to help him teach the deeper truths which his sympathetic nature enables him to feel.

THE PATIENCE OF HOPE.

BY THE REV. ROBERT COLLYER.*

"It is good that a man should both hope and wait."—Lam. iii. 26.

IT was my fortune on a summer's morning to watch a man at work in his garden, who made these words true to me in a very simple, earthward fashion, and so sweetly that the incident has stayed in my heart as some rare stanza in a poem will, or a noble strain of music.

It was a sultry morning, after a night of fitful and fevered rest, when I had risen quite early, and gone out doors to find no breath of air stirring in the heavens or sign of dew on the grass or the flowers, while, as it seemed to me, the very birds in the copse near at hand had no heart to sing their cheerful matin song. I was very much of their mind, also. But, as I sat there in the silence, I saw a man come out from his small home, near where I sat, to begin his day's work. It was a pretty place, standing in a small garden; and there was a bright look on the man's face when he came forth which made me feel a touch of shame, I think, for the look he would see on mine if he should turn to where I was sitting. But he had something else and something better to do. His first care, I noticed, was to leave the door of his living-room wide open, and open the windows also toward the morning, and then to hold up his face and his hand toward the heavens, that he might find the promise there I could not find anywhere as I sat nursing my discontent; while I thought there was a hopeful look, as he turned away, in his poise and posture, as if he was saying with the old prophet, There is a sign in the heavens of abundance of rain.

But no doubt he had done this on many a morning to find that all signs may fail in such a drought as this was, and so he must be the human providence once more which would see to the things in his garden plot which could not wait for the downpour of the heavens. So he began presently to bend over the green things growing and the flowers, as I thought, in a sort of tender pity and love for them, and to clear away what was withered in the fervent fires of yesterday; and, when this was all done, he went away with his can to the rear of the house for water to tide them over another day, and still another, if he must, until the hope was made good for them which seemed to have kissed his face and hand.

He spent an hour or more in the garden; and then it was time to begin his real day's work, which lay in the factory not far away. He was the engineer, as I found afterward; and so he must be early on hand to clear out the grates, to open the flues, to start the fire in the furnace, to watch the steam gauge, and see that all was right with the central motive power, on which all things over there must rest and turn. So, when this was done, and it was time to begin work, the steam trumpet rang through the still morning, true to the moment; and the mill hands began to flock in to their day's work in the factory, from the small town.

Now the man had said no word to me, and was not aware, I suppose, that I was watching him at his work in the small garden, but just went his way from the pleasant to the painful task, for such a day as that was;

while I said in my heart, I would like to tell you, my cheerful fellow, how in this hour you have sung me a psalm and preached me a sermon I hope I shall not forget in what you have done, coming out as you came, with that bright look on your face to greet the new day I greeted with this cloud of discontent on mine, throwing those windows and the door wide open to the morning born from above, holding up your face and your hand for the promise of the rain and the season of refreshing from on high, but watering the plants and the flowers all the same, lest once more the promise should fail through your failure to do a man's part, and then turning away, when that was done, to make good your covenant of a day's work for a day's wages yonder in the factory, and so making good the great apostle's word within the power of your humble striving: "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it."

Nor, as he went his way, could I guess whether he had said some brief prayer before he came out to preach me that sermon and sing me the song without words; but I said again in my heart, These things you have done are a prayer at the heart of all doing—a prayer which would not affront those that rise from the heart of devout men and women all round the world this morning, while it was far more to the purpose, I think, than mine was, which ended in my sitting here in this ugly and dismal mood.

Then I said in my musing, If you are the man I take you to be, this morning may be one with a great many that have come and gone, when you would be there betimes as you were, with the bright face and the hand lifted toward the heavens, feeling forth toward the promise, while those flowers that bloomed in your heart's love for them before they could begin to bloom in your garden would only be cared for all the more when day by day you waited, and the hope deferred would not make your heart sick, because you would say to yourself, and it may be to them, It will be all right with you and ide tomorrow; while a tomorrow would be sure to come when the ancient promise would come true: "I will hear the heavens, saith the Lord, and the heavens shall hear the earth, and the earth shall hear the corn and wine and oil; and they shall hear the cry of my people."

Once more I could well believe that my monitor and singer of the morning psalm was tired out, when he went to his rest, with the hard day's work and the sultriness of many yesterdays in which the springs of life had run low for us all, and might well have said that morning: What is the use of my doing more than my day's work in the factory, keeping up the fires and looking after the engine—for that must be done? So I will let the plants wither and the flowers fade, and heaven and earth may answer for the blasting of my hope. But there he was at sunrise, seeing what could be done to make the best of what seemed so bad, and to slay such a paltry purpose, if, indeed, it had got a grip on his cheerful and hopeful heart. He would do this, and then he would find the good cheer answer to his good striving for the rescue of the things he loved from disaster and death. He would give them a new lease of life by working the pump I heard creaking in the rear of his small home, bearing back and forth the can, and so make good for his garden plot another word in the Holy Book touching the life that now is and that which is to come: "Be faithful, and strengthen the things which remain that are ready to die."

And then, as I still mused over the sight, I said it might well fall to this man's lot to remember how he had failed in some dry time like this to lift his hand and face heavenward, feeling forth toward the promise, and so, quite out of heart shall I say, in all reverence, had failed to help God dress and keep the garden; had said in his heart, It is no use trying any more: the plants must wither and the flowers must fade. But the blessed rains had come all the same. Only this was his trouble—that, because he had lost heart and hope that day, they had come too late, and then he would see where the fault lay, and the failure. They lay in the failure of his own faith and hope in the great Mother Nature and in God. But then I said, This may have given birth, after all, to the eager and hopeful glance I saw on his face just now. And from that time forth he would work the pump and bear the can for all they were worth, as we say, and win by the faithful striving that which would not refresh the plants and the flowers alone, but refresh the man himself, and another man, it may be, he will never hear of; while from that time he would never let the heart in him brood too much or too long over the dry and dusty times, but would summon faith and hope on each new morning like this to help heaven from the springs within that would never again run dry.

And now may I tell you how good it was, and pleasant, to notice how the noble Scripture was verified—"Be not weary in well-doing; for ye shall reap your reward, if ye faint not"—when, on the very day after our silent meeting, the rain came down in a beautiful abundance to bless the garden plot, and the cool breezes came to fan him all day long at his work among the enginery, to stay my own discontent also, and make good for me the words of my text, It is good that a man should both hope and wait, should nourish this spirit and temper through which the soul in us feels her wings, the hope which puts us in a working mood, and holds the terms of her own fulfilment—

Waits through the darkness for the coming dawn,

Frustrated day by day, but still to victory borne—the winged spirit which stands ready to sing to us as she sang to my rich poor man that morning, if we will only lift up the hand and turn the face toward the promise which lies for ever in the new mornings of God—the divine alchemy, as the good seer says, which can help us turn the bare and common stones of our life into rich and rare jewels.

OBITUARY.

MISS BARTRAM.

WE regret to announce the death, on the 20th inst., of Miss Agnes Eularia Bartram, of Highbury. She had been in failing health for the past eighteen months, and at the last passed peacefully away. Her remains were cremated at Woking, after a short service conducted by the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks.

Miss Bartram completed her fiftieth year last June. Her youth was spent at Southtown, near Great Yarmouth, and after the death of her parents she lived at Norwich with her aunt, Miss Sarah Lettis. She subsequently removed to London, where the greater part of her life was spent, though she travelled a good deal on the Continent and in America. She was at one time a contributor of reviews to THE INQUIRER, and for some years edited Young Days under the name of "Cousin May." In conjunction with her brother, the late Richard Bartram, she compiled a harvest festival service for use in our schools and churches. Like her brother, she was much interested in education in day and Sunday-schools. She was a "manager" of a group of Board-schools and a teacher at Newington-green Sunday-school. She was a member of Unity Church, Islington, and an active worker in the various institutions connected with the church. She was also a worker in connection with the Postal Mission. A life of persistent and intelligent well-doing was hers, and she has passed into well-earned rest.

THE WAY.

"HE doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it."—Sir Philip Sidney, "Apology for Poetry."

The chart of Life is in my hands,
The authentic ways are plain to see.
Why droop ye then, O useless hands?
O wavering feet, why tarry ye?

The knowledge that ye need is here,
The paths to keep, the paths to shun,
Yet all day long ye falter here,
And all your journeying stays undone.

O Thou who art Thyself the Way,
Its own sweet prospect and its goal,
Entice me Thine enchanted way,
Allure and fascinate my soul.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned, and ye have not lamented."

THE Eastern pipe, a sort of flageolet, was familiar to the dwellers in Palestine. Shepherds played it as they led their flocks among the hills; at festivals it called the bystanders to rejoice with those that rejoiced; at funerals its wailing bade them weep with those that wept—it was always a call to sympathy.

Once in the high Alps, on a perfect summer morning, I was walking along the bank of one of the foaming, rushing rivers that run among the valleys, and wondering whether anything could be more beautiful than the scene which lay before me, when I heard a soft sweet strain like that with which the Pied Piper of Hamelin beguiled the children to their doom. A very small goat-herd was sitting on a jutting rock just over my head, and playing to himself and his goats; his legs dangling, and his small fingers making music to his own intense delight. He seemed the very incarnation of Blake's vision—"Piping down the valleys wild, piping songs of pleasant glee"—and the whole world seemed the purer and richer for that little song of innocence.

Even in our dull, dark, grimy London, the sound of the organ on the pavement brings the young things running like a brood of chickens, and sets them dancing to its music.

But the text says, "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced." That is, all over the world, in far away countries and close at home, perhaps sitting next you in class, there is some one—man, woman, or child—crying out for sympathy, for that which you could give, if you would only listen and still the clamour of selfishness and ambition, which drowns the still small voice pleading with you.

Sympathy—such a common thing, you say, costing nothing; and yet the most priceless gift one human soul can give another. It is to feel with, not only for, others; just as in your own body the aching tooth, or the throbbing head, sends its message of pain to the farthest nerve, so to receive the impression of the joy or sorrow of others that it becomes a part of ourselves.

All the best work of the world has been done by the exercise of this faculty. Lord Shaftesbury, Elizabeth Fry, John Howard, and all the noble men and women who have devoted their lives to the cause of the oppressed and downtrodden have triumphed over the callousness and selfishness which opposed their efforts by virtue of this divine gift, which not only made them feel the sufferings of others as if they were their own, but enabled them to transmit the passion of pity to the world and rouse men from their selfishness to noble action.

You all know how sometimes the electric bell refuses to act and no sound comes, press the button as hard and as often as you can. Then the electrician comes and tells us the zinc has little crystals formed on it which have eaten away the metal and made it useless. Just so, if we do not guard our hearts carefully from the rust of selfishness, they will become dull and unresponsive, deaf to the calls for sympathy, and giving back no answer to the cry for help.

And don't let us forget that our sympathy is needed almost as much by the happy as the sorrowful. To tell a friend of our joy is to have the joy doubled. We are told to rejoice with those that rejoice, as well as to weep with those that weep. And the reward is that so the joy of others becomes as our own; and our sympathy acts like a magnet, attracting to us all that is joyful and beautiful around us; and we live, not shut up in ourselves, but open to all the best life of the world, and become true children of our Father, God.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Psalms of the West.

LET us bring unto God more than praise; let us honour Him with more than prayer.

Let a joyful spirit be our anthem, and unceasing righteousness our service.

When thou criest to Him, He cannot break His laws to help thine error. If thou pleadest with Him and givest not all thy strength for that thou desirest, thou dishonourest Him that gave thee a mind after His image.

Let us not ask for more than a right spirit, nor supplicate for more than a wise father would harken unto.

Let us act for the highest good in holiness of purpose, and we shall gain strength as He desireth. Hath He not given us a heart to behold righteousness, and reason to discover His law?

The child that asketh for much and doeth little causeth sorrow and weakness, and shall fail in the time of trouble.

The gifts of heaven are poured upon thee; the sun giveth light that thou mayest work, and the darkness of night provideth for thy rest.

Thou knowest that the rain cannot always refresh a thirsty land, nor the warmth whiten thy harvests duly in every season.

Pray not specially for thine own ease, for the winds are not made for thy choice herbs, nor the clouds apportioned by the measure of thy cisterns.

Dig deep thy wells in the time of plenty, store thy goods against the evil day, and spare thy substance that in famine thou mayest arise as a deliverer.

By storms the tree acquireth strength. From the barren hills cometh nobleness. By resistance the soul giveth forth the sweetness of music.

A good ship is safe on the stormy waters; if every eye and hand be quick, the billows will menace in vain.

A clean city escapeth plague, and by continual care may a nation be preserved in health.

Wait not, therefore, for the evil day to fall on thy knees in sharp distress, for thou knowest now that disease is in the world, and that loving thoughtfulness is the prayer beloved of God.

Consider every enemy and prepare strenuously for every ambush; make thy house safe against infection, and thy children against deception.

Bring knowledge abundantly to bless the people, and science to overthrow the creatures of darkness.

Let every man be instructed in the world's laws, and let every mind be trained in reason and skill.

Let him learn in lowliness and walk humbly in wisdom; let his heart be full of zeal, and his life a sacrifice of thanksgiving in sure obedience.

THOUGH we fail indeed, you—I—a score of such weak workers, He fails never. If He cannot work by us, He will work over us. Does He want a man, much less a woman, think you? Every time a star winks there, so many souls are born, who all shall work too. Let our own be calm: we should be ashamed to sit beneath those stars, impatient that we're nothing.—E. B. Browning.

PRIEST OR PROPHET.

Writing last week of "Religion and the Church," we acknowledged the great value of Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S recently published volume of essays on Catholicism, with their searching criticism of the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church of England, and the contrast so forcibly drawn out between the exclusive claims of an ecclesiastical and sacerdotal theory and the spiritual character of the religion of JESUS. Another book to which we should be glad to draw the attention of our readers, as valuable in the same connection, is Dr. JOHN BROWN'S "Apostolical Succession in the Light of History and Fact,"* being the Congregational Union Lecture published last year, and delivered in the previous autumn.

Dr. BROWN is well known as the biographer of BUNYAN, and is minister of the Bunyan Church at Bedford. As Chairman of the Congregational Union in 1891, he took for the subject of his address, "The Historic Episcopate: a Re-examination of its Claims," and in his Congregational Union Lecture, which is really a substantial volume of eleven lectures, he works out the same subject with great fullness and a careful citation of authorities, in a moderate and earnest tone, showing on what scanty grounds the claim of Apostolical succession and of priestly prerogative is based. In a work covering so wide a field, the keen controversialists of the opposing camp may perhaps be able to point out some inaccuracies of historical statement and some lapses of critical judgment in detail, but there is a broadness of view in these lectures, and a cumulative force in the argument, which can hardly fail to convince the unbiassed reader that the main thesis of the book is sound: that the claim on the part of the episcopate to unbroken Apostolical succession, securing the validity of orders in the Church and the supernatural grace said to be vested in the priesthood, is not to be made good from the history of the early Church, and has been only an episode in the history of the reformed Church of England.

How vital this question is, in Dr. BROWN'S view, will be seen from the following passage of his introductory lecture:—

It is a question as to whether the Christian ministry is a vocation from God, or the work of an official caste like that of the Brahmins; whether religion is a spiritual and inward thing, a life of love and service to God and man, or something mechanical, external, sacramental, dependent upon certain technical qualifications in the person who officiates. It is scarcely too much to say that it is a question on which very largely depends the religious future of the nation, determining whether it shall advance to a broader and more enlightened spiritual life, or whether, as some fear, we shall under priestly influences go back to the ages of superstition.

And, again, in the second lecture:—

"Valid orders" is a mere ecclesiastical phrase, for which there is not the slightest warrant in Scripture. No ordination is valid—in other words, worth anything—by whomsoever performed, if the man ordained has received no inward call from God, has no qualifications spiritual or intellectual for the work of the ministry, and has never commended himself to spiritual men as a true servant of Christ.

Dr. BROWN, in his earlier lectures, examines the evidence of the New Testament and of the other Christian literature of the first two centuries bearing on questions of Church organisation, and having shown what grave uncertainties attach to the theory of Apostolical succession, urges that it is inconceivable that a truth of such primary importance to the religious life of the world (as the theory in question pre-supposes) could have been left in such doubt. The earliest forms of Church life bear no trace of it, and the "bishop" was not at first distinguished from other elders in the Church, nor did the first apostles and teachers exercise or claim any sacerdotal functions. It was in later generations, and through the conflict of orthodoxy for supremacy in the Church, that the hierarchy of priest and bishop grew up. Heathen elements came in, and the Church adapted herself to rule in the world, culminating in the stupendous claims of the Papacy. The heads of the English Church and the Pope at Rome cannot agree as to the validity of Anglican orders, but Dr. BROWN'S examination of history shows how far removed such a controversy is from the realities of a true ministry of religion.

The two concluding lectures deal with the Anglican Church in Tudor times and in the subsequent period down to the issue of the first "Tracts for the Times" in 1833. The evidence shows how thoroughly Protestant many of ELIZABETH'S bishops were, and what close relations were maintained with the Presbyterian churches of the Continent. Dr. BROWN argues that the Church in Tudor times was essentially Erastian in theory as in practice under ELIZABETH'S masterful rule, and that it was in fact as a counter move to the growing claims of the Presbyterians, basing their theory of Church government distinctly on Scriptural authority, that the high Anglican claims and the theory of Apostolical succession were brought forward in the English Church. But neither LAUD nor the Non-jurors represented any established and generally accepted principle in the Church, and with their departure the theory fell once more into abeyance, until it was revived by the leaders of the Oxford movement in reaction against Liberalism in religion. History and the facts of spiritual life in the different communions of Christendom are against the theory, and Dr. BROWN has rendered good service by the clear exposition of his lectures.

Priest or Prophet, as leader and teacher in the Church, is the alternative which the discussion of this question of Apostolical succession sets before us; and we cannot hesitate as to which will best sustain a true religious life, or which is nearest to the mind of CHRIST. What is needed in the ministry of a living Church is not an official or a mediator separately endowed to stand between the gathering of worshippers and their God, but one of the brethren (or more than one), united with the rest in the one spirit of worship, and called to the service of the Church because of gifts of utterance and sympathy, which make him quick to interpret the Divine Word and to speak for the uplifting and the help of all, what is in his heart and theirs. The minister, in all humility, must be a prophet of God, not claiming as a priest supernatural endowments given only to his class, claiming nothing for himself that is not open to every child of God, but looking ever toward the light, waiting that his heart may be kindled and possessed by truth, which he will utter not in his own strength or wisdom, but because it does possess him, as the truth of God. He is set apart because he is deeply impressed with the need of such religious fellowship. He devotes himself to that helpful service, seeking for wisdom and understanding, that the great books of Nature and of History may be open to him, and he may be able to make articulate the thoughts of many hearts. He is among the brethren as one who serves, not as a superior, claiming to rule; his constant prayer is that God may rule and direct, that his own life and the life of the whole brotherhood of the Church may become a true organ of the Divine purpose in the world.

THE PULPIT.

PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD.

A SERMON BY THE REV. SILAS FARRINGTON.

"Prepare to meet thy God."—Amos iv. 12.

No text is more familiar to us than this. Though, perhaps, not one in a hundred knows where it is to be found—or what was its exact application when first used, yet every one feels its short, sharp summons. I suppose nearly everyone takes it as a warning to prepare for death, and judgment after death.

This was not the meaning of Amos. Still his meaning was distinct and terrible. He is speaking to the rich and wanton classes of the northern kingdom of Israel, and recounts the various warnings and punishments by which the Lord has tried to recall them to himself: these people who observe the fasts and feasts, and yet oppress the poor, and crush the needy, who—in the bitter words of the prophet—"go to Bethel and transgress, and at Gilgal multiply transgression." Blight and drought, pestilence on man and beast, and famine has the Lord sent in vain upon these. Now He will come in person to judge them; therefore "prepare to meet thy God, O Israel!" It is a national doom for national sin, and a punishment in this world, of which it speaks.

It is not, of course, in this sense that I wish to use the phrase. This warning, "Prepare to meet thy God," is really too full of meaning and suggestion to be limited to its original intention. Dropping all that Amos meant by it, and dropping, as far as we can, what others have meant by it, dropping even the vague or distressful notions we may have had about it, let us ask ourselves what it really is to meet God.

Meeting, I think, always implies, first, a coming together; and, then, a consciousness, a recognition of each other. Both these conditions must be fulfilled before you really "meet" any one. Jostling against your friend in the dark, or in the crowd, when you are so taken up with other objects that you do not recognise him, is not meeting him; but when you see him at your side, when you grasp his hand, when you look into his eyes, and know that it is he, then you meet him.

Just so simple a thing it is to "meet God." God is here always. He is never for one moment absent from this world—nor from us. Yet it is only now and then that we meet Him, it is only now and then that we are conscious of Him. For the most part we are so taken up with other things and other thoughts that we do not see Him. In general, we see but very little of all this manifold world offers to our seeing. Unless our attention is somehow called to them, the most curious, the most interesting things are daily overlooked by us. Our eyes and our minds can hold very little at a time. In order to see anything our eye has to focus itself on that one thing. For the time we can only see that thing. It shuts out the rest. An astronomer was trying to show a friend some distant star through his telescope. "But I cannot see it; I cannot see anything," said his friend. Then the astronomer pointed out more exactly the very square in the field of the telescope where his friend should look. He told him just what a small sparkle of light he must look for. At last the ray, falling from such unimaginable millions of miles of distance, met the friend's eye; and he knew it was the star he had been trying to find. "I see it, I see it!" he said. "Well, now you will always be able to see it when you look," said the astronomer.

But we need not think of the far off star. The wayside flower, the sunset, the singing bird, the twisted rock, the things always with us, are not seen or known by us unless we observe, unless we look for them. Though they are all here all the time, we only recognise, we only meet, we only take them in and enjoy them now and then.

Is it not so with our sense of God? He is, indeed, as I said, a constant Presence. Yet it does not follow from this that our sense of Him is constant. That is what we want it to become; but at present it is not this with most of us. We feel God more strongly at one time than at another. This sense of Him may be thought of as a meeting Him. Meeting itself implies a sense of absence—times when we are not strongly conscious of Him, or, perhaps, not conscious of Him at all. Then this sense of Him comes again, and we feel how close He is, and that he has never been absent.

Now a meeting of friends may be either planned or unexpected; so it is with these Divine meetings. They come at the times and places set apart for them. They also come at unexpected moments, and exceptional experiences, like a surprise. When our hearts are deeply moved in joy, or in grief, or in anxiety, the thought of God comes to those who live for the most part without thinking of Him. The deeper experience, the longing for help, gratitude, joy, bring Him before us as the One from whom our help must be sought. At these exceptional moments we "meet" Him who is so apt to be hidden by the accustomed course of things. We meet Him whom in our usual mood we ignore or disregard. Happy is it for us that these experiences come to us without our planning them, and open our eyes to the Great Presence that always stands behind the veil of things.

But, also, there are appointed ways along which we may go to meet Him as to a rendezvous, sure of finding Him: I mean the path of prayer, the path of worship, the path of meditation. He who takes these ancient and well-known paths in simplicity and sincerity will meet God in them for a certainty. Draw near to Him, and He will draw near to you; as the experience of generations testifies.

Understanding in this sense what "meeting" God is—that it means coming into felt relation with Him—that it means not that He comes and goes, but that we do—we may think what "preparing" for this meeting means. "Prepare to meet thy God." It must make a great difference to this preparation, whether we are in the habit of thinking of God as a friendly or as a hostile power. Too often we think of Him as unfriendly—as One who sees our faults, detects our sins, and is certain to punish them. Then the thought of meeting Him alarms and terrifies. Oh, if we could only put off the evil day! If we could only escape it altogether! If we could only propitiate Him in some way, by our humiliation, by our sacrifices, by punishing ourselves! All this is unwelcome and painful.

But if we have learned to think of Him as friendly, what a different thing it becomes to meet Him! What a gladness and joy it is! There is nothing sweeter than the thought of meeting a friend. With what pleasure we say to ourselves, To-morrow—to-day—he will be here! How we like to put our house, and ourselves, in cheerful array; to put out of sight all that might annoy or jar; to lay aside care, and worry, and pre-occupation, so that we may offer our friend our best and receive his best, or make the most of the opportunity. Our natural instinct leads us to do this. And so our meeting is a joy in anticipation—and a joy when we recall it. Our whole sense of our friendship grows more strong and more constant for this meeting. Indeed, meeting is almost essential to keep friendship from growing faint. By not meeting, our friend seems to grow less real, less warm, less necessary to us; and ends by dropping out of our life altogether.

So, "Prepare to meet thy God," should be to us a welcome sound. It means—prepare to meet, to realise Him who is our truest and best Friend; make ready once more to taste and see His goodness, to feel how in all His dealings with us He seeks our highest welfare. It means, renew thy sense of His ever present love—renew thy hope, renew thy courage, renew thy trust. Prepare thyself thus to meet Him.

What hinders our thus meeting God? Largely our pre-occupation with self, and selfward aims, hinder. While we are putting our momentary and trivial purposes in the front rank, they block out God. To prepare to meet Him, then, is to lay these aside. Our excitements and passions, our self-will and prejudices hinder it. Our irritations, our animosities hinder it, and must also be laid aside if we truly want to meet God. All these stir up such a thick dust about us that God cannot be seen through it. We prepare to meet God by absolutely putting these away. We need great quietness of spirit to meet God. Not dulness, but quietness. And we seldom dwell in so unperturbed a mood that we do not need some actual effort of will—some little space for recollecting ourselves, some pause—before we can really enter the Divine Presence, in the sense of being profoundly conscious of it—of feeling it.

Preparation is what we need—preparation of heart, of will, of conscience—to concentrate our thought, our purpose, on meeting God—that we may meet Him. And the want of this preparation is what makes us so dull, and cold, and insensible to even the highest occasions;—and the thought of the hours we ourselves have fixed for meeting Him, so distasteful to us—hours of worship;—so commonly neglected by us! We are not prepared for them. Let us think, for instance, of our meeting here for common worship. We come, surely, that we may find God here. That is the end of our singing, and our praying, and our instruction—not that we may be entertained, or interested, merely, but that we may realise in a fuller degree the Divine nearness, and will, and love; that we may feel our fellowship with Him, and receive His light and His life. But to do this demands a preparation on the part of each one, without which all that is said or done here will be vain or formal. It will not do to come without emptying our heart, so to speak, of trivial distractions, of party spirit, of petty vanities or spites, that it may be open to receive a nobler guest. When we come languid and dull, full of contention and passion, or with hearts entirely engrossed or entangled with worldly plans and cares, it is little likely that we shall meet God here. No. What we hear will not penetrate or touch us. Psalm, hymn, prayers, and sermon will all be likely to seem an empty babble about things we don't believe in or care for! We are not prepared to meet our God. By God's grace it may indeed be otherwise; and something may find and move us, as by a happy accident, and God be found of them that sought Him not. But we cannot depend on this. It is by duly preparing for them, and by this alone, that we can rely on finding these services sacred, dear, delightful, helpful, and real to us. Let not anyone be surprised if, having come here, not expecting any good, he gets none—if having come without detaching his mind from its canker or its care, these choke his mind, and it remains unsusceptible and unfruitful. If he comes apathetic, listless, without collecting his soul, without bending his attention and his efforts in the true direction, let him not wonder that deep emotions, and holy desires, and renewals of strength do not visit him. To come to church with less preparation than we make for the concert—the dinner—how vain and unprofitable it is, and ever must be!

"Prepare to meet thy God." Come with thoughtfulness, come with humility, come with desire and expectation; come with reverence, with teachableness; come with a quiet and a grateful heart: and you shall truly meet Him. In His presence shall you find peace—yea, "fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore."

THE ANGLO-CATHOLIC REVIVAL.

WE have lately heard much about the Romanising tendencies of a large number of the English clergy, but the real danger against which we ought to be on our guard is not Roman Catholicism but Anglo-Catholicism. When Newman, Manning, and Faber went over to the Church of Rome there was just alarm lest their example should be widely followed, but this has not happened. It is Pusey and Keble whose convictions have "caught on," and who could now count their followers among the Church of England clergy by the thousand. The secessions to Rome have lately been few, and never include any of the leaders of thought. Moreover, a fair proportion of those who do go over to Rome come back again—come back disappointed, having found how hollow are her pretensions to teach infallible truth and satisfy every legitimate yearning of the soul. The return of these men is all the more significant because they come back with none but kindly feelings for the Church they leave. Rome has been very good to them, has done her best for them; but that best is not enough where deep spiritual needs are felt. The Anglo-Catholic feels his position far superior to that of Rome. What he wants to restore is Catholicism, not the mediæval corruption of it known as Romanism. The Protestant agitation of the present day is misdirected so far as it is confined to denunciations and dread of Rome, and it is a grievous pity that Protestant zeal should be fighting an unreal foe and neglecting the real danger. This real danger lies in the Prayer-book in its present state. Our Puritan forefathers were not contending for straws and shadows when they made heroic sacrifices and endured cruel persecution in their endeavours to secure a thorough reformation of the National Church. Their efforts failed, the English Church remained a compromise, the Thirty-nine Articles were supposed to be a sufficient guard against the corruptions of Rome; but the victory remained essentially with those who secured that the ministers of the Church should be required to be ordained as priests. Here is the crux of the whole matter.

Let us look more closely into this and see what it involves. All over England there is dread of the re-establishment of the Confessional. We dread it as a violation of the sanctity of the home. As a high-spirited independent nation resents outside interference with its own affairs, so do we resent interference of the priest with the most private concerns of family life, coming between husband and wife, parent and child, and bringing in a foreign dominion all the more hateful because the force behind is spiritual, not material. We know, too, what evil fruit the Confessional has borne in Roman Catholic countries. It has weakened true modesty, and so has done terrible harm in matters connected with sexual morality. It has furthered many a crime by fostering the notion that secret confession to a priest and his absolution will get rid of the consequences of that crime. Some years ago, a French peasant killed his old mother in order to seize upon her savings. The murder was accompanied by acts of incredible barbarity: the old woman was burnt alive in the presence of her own grandchildren. But one thing the murderer did not neglect: he summoned the priest that his mother might confess to him just before she died; and, after the crime, he himself confessed it safely under the seal of secrecy to the priest. Now, if such evils attend the Roman Catholic Confessional, in spite of its being safe-guarded by tremendous sanctions—of its being part of a system in which heaven and hell are as real as daylight is to any of us—what is likely to happen when the Confessional is introduced by amateurs, such as our English Church clergymen are compared with Roman Catholics, amid all the shades of scepticism and half-belief which characterise our modern thought? We are indeed justified in doing our best to prevent the Confessional being re-introduced into the Church of England.

But looking at the matter from the point of view of a man ordained to be a priest of this Church, it appears in a very different light. He may well believe it his duty to urge the people in his parish to come to the Confessional. The words in the Prayer-book are clear enough, and are not sufficiently studied by laymen. The Service for the Ordering of Priests is a very solemn one, and, after catechism and prayer, comes the Bishop's impressive charge: "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God, now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His holy Sacraments." And again, "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God, and to minister the holy Sacraments in the congregation, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto."

Here we are at the root of the matter; here is what unites the Church of England with the Greek and Roman Churches, and divides it from all others—this Ordering of Priests, this essential belief that by a certain ceremony a class of men can be invested with spiritual powers which no other man can possess. The difference concerns no trifle; the whole relation of the human soul to God—going to Heaven or going to Hell—is here involved: "Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained." Can a more awful power be committed into a man's hands than this, the power of acting as God's agent in regard to forgiving and retaining sins? But how can the priest know whose sins he ought to forgive and whose sins he ought to retain, except through the medium of the Confessional? Let the husband come to him and tell him things that he will not tell to his own wife; let the wife come and confess to the priest secrets that she will not confess to her husband; let the daughter come and confess what she will not tell to her mother; and then the priest can forgive the sins of the penitent, and the penitents may know that they are forgiven. See how this practice is bound up with one of the profoundest truths taught by Christ—namely, this, that God's forgiveness depends on penitence, and is given to the truly penitent. This is recognised in the Absolution which forms part of every morning and evening prayer in the Church of England, the Absolution which only a priest may read; even a deacon may not utter these words:—

God, who desirest not the death of a sinner . . . and hath given power and commandment unto his ministers to declare and pronounce unto His people, being penitent, the absolution and remission of their sins: He pardoneth and absolveth all them that truly repent and unfeignedly believe in his Holy Gospel.

These words are spoken to the whole congregation, they involve no obvious distinction between those who are penitent, the true believers, and those who are not, between those who are forgiven and those who are not. Those who feel penitent can take to themselves the comfort of the forgiveness. But suppose there are some who are not sure whether they are forgiven—and remember how such a doubt as this has tormented many of the purest and highest minds—suppose they eagerly desire an individual and personal assurance, and believe that in their priest they have someone who is divinely authorised to give them this assurance, and let this priest himself be a sincere conscientious man, who believes he has received this authority, and is bidden to exercise it as part of his duty: "Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained"—how can he know whose sins he should forgive, and whose sins he should retain, without hearing private confession?

But the matter is not left here. Every churchman, every churchwoman, after confirmation, is expected to attend the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and the priest fails in his duty unless he urges this upon them. And let us not imagine that this Sacrament is in the Church of England a simple memorial service, having the spiritual efficacy which a service in memory of Jesus Christ may naturally have on his disciples. No, the Church of England teaches Consubstantiation, instead of Transubstantiation—never mind the exact shade of difference here implied—the Church teaches that the priest can do something at this service which no one save a priest can do, and that when the priest has done this, to partake of the elements is a duty incumbent on all true Christians. If the priest see that his people are negligent in attending, he shall use an exhortation which warns them that their excuses will avail nothing before God, and that sore punishment hangeth over their heads when they wilfully abstain. On the other hand, there are most solemn warnings against coming unworthily. The priest has to declare:

If any of you be a blasphemer of God, a hinderer or slanderer of His word, an adulterer, or be in malice or envy or any other grievous crime, repent you of your sins, or else come not to that Holy table, lest, after taking of that Holy Sacrament, the Devil enter into you as he entered into Judas, and fill you full of all iniquities, and bring you to destruction both of body and soul.

These words explain the further exhortation with which the priest has to warn the people just before they partake of the elements:

So is the danger great if we receive the same unworthily. For then we are guilty of the body and blood of Christ, our Saviour; we eat and drink our own damnation, not considering our Lord's body; we kindle God's wrath against us; we provoke Him to plague us with divers diseases and sundry kinds of death.

Is not this enough to make the tender-hearted and conscientious anxious to receive assurance that they are worthy to join in the Communion which they are ordered not to neglect? This assurance is provided for them by the Prayer-book. The priest, on announcing when the Sacrament will be held, has to declare:

And because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience, therefore, if there be any of you who by this means cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution together with ghostly counsel and advice to the quieting of his conscience and the avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness.

Can we not see the religious comfort of this system of confession? And looking at the matter from the point of view of the earnest, conscientious priest, can we not see how he will feel pledged by his ordination vows to urge the people to come to the Sacrament, to come worthily, and, if they feel doubts or scruples, to come to him for ghostly counsel and advice? So long as the only entrance to the ministry of the Church is through the present ordination service, the best men in the Church will be those who take their priesthood seriously, and it is idle to expect them to go on neglecting what they new feel to be solemn duty. The wonder is that so many generations have passed before we see the consequences of retaining in the Prayer-book what the Puritans strove in vain to eliminate. But for the past sixty years, the High Churchmen have carried all before them, because they are the most conscientious and earnest; and they will go on doing this in spite of all protesting outcries, and they will have the right and the power to do this so long as the Prayer-book remains unreformed.

The men who are most in earnest will always win the day, and these, in the Church of England, are the Anglican priests who believe in their priesthood and know that the Church is theirs. It is silly to tell such men that they have no right in the English Church, and that they ought to go over to Rome. They expect Rome to come to them. What they seek to revive is the early Catholicism which conquered paganism. It was not the religion of Jesus, but it was a religion wonderfully well adapted to average human nature, because it was willing and able to utilise the means, scenic and dramatic, which make religion interesting to the masses of the people. In early Catholic days, when the monasteries were founded and the churches were built, the people cared for religion in a way that is difficult for us to realise, so different is it from the state of things existing now. That is what is being revived among us by these priests of the Church of God. They wish to abjure Romish errors, to bring back true Catholicism, and to judge for themselves what is true Catholicism and what are the errors of Rome.

THE NEW CATECHISM.

SIR,—That Dr. Horton did not assist in compiling the new Catechism I knew; but that has nothing to do with the matter. I referred to him, as I referred to Professor Adeney and Mr. Snell, because the teachings of both these very prominent "Free Church" men respecting the Bible make the phrase "God's word written" monstrous; and because the beliefs and certainties of Dr. Horton and Mr. Snell are widely shared by all sorts of "Free Church" people. The blunt truth is that, for the most part, this Catechism is a kind of pious fraud—of course, not intended as a fraud, but a fraud all the same. It does not tell the modern truth: it economises and readjusts the ancient error. It sets up something to which all can formally take off their hats in passing, and then go and say what they like: and that is precisely what we do not want just now. We have too many patches on the broken panes.

IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

SIR,—How does the case stand at the present moment with respect to the facilities for University Education in Ireland? (1) There is the ancient and richly endowed University of Dublin, with its single college, Trinity, under Protestant Episcopalian management, but perfectly free from tests except in the theological faculty, as Oxford and Cambridge are. This University is capable of development and extension; and there is no reason why additional colleges, under Catholic or any other management, should not be affiliated to it on condition that they also are to the same extent free from religious tests. (2) The Royal University of Ireland is an examining body, established and endowed by the State, the offices of honour and emolument being largely filled by Catholics. This University has nothing to do with religion or theology, and confers its degrees, after stringent examination, upon men and women of all shades of opinion, whether they have been educated at any college or not. It might be made into a Teaching instead of a mere Examining University, by confining its operations to affiliated colleges, whether Catholic, Presbyterian, or Secular, and granting its degrees without regard to the religious views of the students. (3) There are the Queen's Colleges at Belfast, Cork, and Galway, absolutely of a secular character, and supported by Government grants. Of these Belfast has a distinguished record, and its managers and students are chiefly Presbyterians, though it is in no respect a Presbyterian College; the Presbyterians have a college close to its doors, but there is no connection between the two. Cork, with a Catholic principal, and more than half of its students Catholic, has also had an honourable career. Its students are chiefly Anglican and Roman Catholic in almost equal proportion. Galway, whose principal is a Catholic Fellow of Trinity College, while over one-third of its students are Catholic, has been a comparative failure, and might well be dispensed with altogether, and its endowments, divided between the other two. Most of the students of these colleges are prepared for the Royal University examinations, in which Belfast especially takes high place. (4) The "Catholic University" so called is an association of Catholic colleges, some of which have distinguished themselves in the examinations of the Royal University—notably University College (St. Stephen's Green, Dublin). I believe that the Catholic Medical School and University College, Blackrock, have also made their mark, but I have no detailed information at hand.

Now Mr. Balfour's proposal is to establish two new Universities with sectarian "atmospheres"—the one Catholic, the other Presbyterian. Nothing is said as to the fate of the Royal University, but the implication seems to be that it will, like its predecessor, the Queen's, be destroyed, or merged into one of the new ones, probably the Catholic University.

The offer of a Presbyterian University to Belfast is, to my mind, the gravest danger of the situation; for it is nothing short of a bribe to the Ulstermen, who are bitterly opposed to the establishment of a Catholic University, to hold their tongues—buying off their opposition by a substantial endowment practically limited to those of their own faith. It remains to be seen what the Ulstermen will do. As yet the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has pronounced with uncompromising determination against any Catholic University scheme. Mr. T. W. Russell has pointed out that an Ulster University with a "Presbyterian atmosphere" has not been asked for by the Presbyterians; though it is undoubtedly true that the establishment of a Belfast University without any sectarian bias whatever would be an acceptable gift to the alumni of Queen's College, Belfast, who have been disestablished once and transferred willy-nilly to a brand-new University which they did not want. A Belfast University would soon make its influence felt, because the Queen's College has from its inception done credit to the intention of its founders, and its graduates would rally to its support. But at the same time, to buy this boon at the cost of a sacrifice at the altar of denominationalism in higher education, would be to pay too high a price. I can only hope that the Presbyterians and the other Protestants of the North of Ireland will maintain an attitude of sturdy opposition to the reactionary proposals of Mr. Balfour.

The whole principle behind these proposals is, to my mind, radically wrong. The pleas put forward are that Irishmen would thus be better educated, and that the Catholics would be more justly treated. I am anxious to give facilities for as many Irishmen and Irish women as possible to obtain a University training; and no one has been more strenuous than I in upholding the right of our Catholic fellow-countrymen to just and equal treatment. But I must decline to support any movement for giving them preferential treatment, on generally the same grounds that I defend the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It was not only that it was the Church of the minority, but that it was unfair to give State favour and emoluments to any one Church. In like manner, the State has no right to subsidise and endow a sectarian college, whether it be to educate Catholic priests in Ireland or Church of England teachers in England. I admit that the difficulty in the way of refusing the Catholic demands is very great, if not insuperable, for the supporters of denominational schools and the teaching of "a common Christianity" in Board schools, because that demand is only for the application to Ireland of the principle adopted by the denominationalists in this country. But "let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung." The inconsistencies of others are none of my concern. It amuses me to see Conservatives in England supporting denominational education because they gain by it; and Orangemen in Ireland denouncing the same thing because they lose by it. It saddens me to see Radicals and Nonconformists pleading for a Catholic University in Ireland while they are trying to turn the priests and the partisans out of the elementary and secondary schools in England. But for myself, the principles which I have consistently applied to the education problem in this country are exactly the same as I would maintain for the Sister Isle. No State endowment of religion: abolition of all theological tests in schools or colleges: a fair field and no favour to all sects and parties alike! It is because Mr. Balfour's proposals seem to me to violate these principles that I oppose them.

But it will be said it is not suggested to establish a Catholic University, but, as the Bishop of Limerick puts it, "A University for teaching secular knowledge on such conditions as will render it at least tolerable for Catholics." It is a specious plea, for, whatever you call them, both mean the same thing in effect. The principle for which I contend is admitted so far as that no tests are to be applied to teachers or students, and no public funds are to be devoted to teaching theology. But the whole "atmosphere" is to be intentionally Catholic from the beginning. This means that the professoriate, the examining body, and the students would be almost without exception Catholic.

The atmosphere would soon be too close for a Protestant to live in: his position would be made too uncomfortable to be tolerable; the whole institution would be abandoned to one denomination, and the University would be sectarian de facto, whatever it might be de jure. If it were anything else indeed in practical effect it would not suit the ecclesiastics, and another change would soon be demanded.

What, then, can be done to meet the just claims of Catholics? If a practically exclusive Catholic University is denied, and an endowment for a Catholic college is refused, it is difficult to see what could be done to satisfy the agitators. Here we must meet them with a non possumus. If they ask us to draw one or more of their colleges into closer fellowship with one of the Universities; if they demand a new Teaching University for Ireland, whether reconstructed from the present Royal or built up anew, with due recognition of their properly qualified institutions, I do not see how we can well refuse their claims. But nothing less than a University to themselves is likely to satisfy them, and that, I maintain, is more than we have any right to grant to them or to any other religious body. Two schemes which I have already hinted at seem to me to be feasible, either of which would be a great improvement on the present state of affairs, and might fairly be considered to meet the justice of the case. (1) The scope of Dublin University might be enlarged, so as to take in, as well as Trinity College, the Queen's College at Belfast, University College, Dublin (Catholic), and perhaps Magee College, Londonderry (Presbyterian), on condition, of course, that no tests were applied unless it were in the faculty of theology. This would be a concession both to Catholics and to Ulster Protestants, and would do no harm to anyone. The University would maintain its prestige by keeping up the standard of its degrees. The Catholics could endow their University College as liberally as they liked without injuring anyone's feelings; the Presbyterians could do the same for Magee College. Queen's College, as being unsectarian, might be more generously helped by the State. Any reproach of sectarianism that still lingers about Trinity College might be taken away at the same time, though there is really no more there than at any of the Oxford or Cambridge Colleges. Or (2) the Royal might be made into a Teaching University on the lines of the old Queen's, having the Queen's Colleges at Belfast and Cork, University College (St. Stephen's Green), and any other deserving colleges in the country, whether Catholic or otherwise, affiliated to it and sharing in its benefits. This University, which would recognise no religious distinctions, might be liberally endowed by the State, leaving the denominational colleges to find their own endowments. The colleges would then train their students in their own way: the University would give its imprimatur to them when they had satisfied its examiners; and all the prizes of the University would be equally open to Catholic and Protestant.

These, of course, are but mere hints of possible developments which at the present stage it is scarcely worth working out. The call for the moment is to oppose the reactionary proposal before the country. Not in the direction of endowing denominationalism does Ireland's salvation lie; sectarianism and party spirit have cursed her destiny too long. It may be but a dream; yet I look forward to the dawning of a day when Catholic and Protestant will be less sharply divided in Ireland, and the old rancours will die down. But this can only be when men can sit side by side and work shoulder to shoulder without quarrelling about differences of opinion. To promote this spirit of fraternity the duty of the State is to deal out even-handed justice, to have the same law all round—not a favour for the Catholic here and for the Episcopalian or Presbyterian there, but to give equal opportunity for all to develop their best possibilities.

C. J. STREET.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF CHARITY.

"THE most utterly hopeless specimen of man yet discovered or evolved is the constant hearer of goody-goody addresses and the habitual recipient of hot victuals, for which he does nothing but lie." So writes Mr. Bramwell Booth in a recent report of "Social Work." And if one turns to the Acts of the Apostles (Chap. vi. 1-4) one finds that, as in the latest so in the earliest efforts of the Christian Church in its charity to the poor, there were serious difficulties. The state of things revealed to us in "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" on this same subject shows how soon the difficulties of charity grew and multiplied.

What are the difficulties to-day if we are charitably disposed? Having nothing to give is one difficulty. And to some people that might seem the greatest difficulty of all. Certainly when you know a really deserving case, and you can see absolute necessity, and yet have nothing more that you can give, it is a serious difficulty. That, however, is not the greatest difficulty, as things usually are. When you haven't, you can't, and that settles that difficulty! But it is those who have, and who are disposed to give, who feel and know what the real difficulties of charity are. Most of us know these difficulties on a smaller or larger scale. The richest man I was ever intimately acquainted with—and who had some thousands a year to give away in one way and another—had more difficulties in his giving than any ten other people put together that I have ever known. And his difficulties were just our difficulties, with a difference of degree. What are they?

(1.) It is very difficult to be charitable without demoralising the object of our charity. In other words, it is difficult to give without doing more harm than good. It is good, of course, to feed the hungry. It is good to clothe the naked and to shelter the unsheltered. These things are good in themselves, if this was the end of them. And if we were doing these things for mere animals, no harm might come of it all. But we ourselves are responsible human beings, and the objects of our charity are the same. They are moral beings, with influence upon others, good or bad. What we do for them does not end in the doing of it; nor does it end with them. And, therefore, we are responsible for more than our mere act of charity. To demoralise a man, woman, or child is a far more serious sin than not feeding and clothing them. And it is easily possible—it is one of the easiest things in the world—to feed and clothe, and give and help out of a good heart and from the purest motives, and yet all the time to be demoralising those for whom we do these things. Have you never seen the process at work on individuals and on families? To begin with they were respectable. They have had, it may be, a feeling of self-respect and a sense of independence. Then some circumstance or other brings them to want. It may be something for which they are not at all to blame—something, in fact, which might happen to any of us. And then they need help; and I say that to receive help under such circumstances (if the help be delicately given) ought to give shame to no one. It is help which any of us might need, and which I hope any of us would give, and, in the true sense, be as grateful to receive as we are glad to give. So far so good.

But now suppose it happens, as it so often does, that that little character a recipient of charity has, so far gives way, under this first experience of help, as to allow himself to wish he could rely on this for the future. The moment a man does that he has fallen! He has begun to feel that he would rather beg than work. His highest motive is not now to earn for himself, but to have somebody else's; and to have it anyhow. He loses his self-respect. He sinks his sense of independence. He ceases to be a man and becomes a sponge. He is demoralised; and for the rest of his life he (or it may be she, for it happens to women as often as to men) shuffles on, earning nothing, or next to nothing, yet somehow, day after day, week in and week out, for years, managing to extract enough out of society to enable him and, it may be, his wife and family to live. The place for such a man or woman is a prison. They are not only demoralised, but they are demoralisers of the district in which they live. Have we in our charity ever helped in the demoralisation of such a man or woman? It is a searching question for each of us to answer. And much more terrible is the question: Have we ever in our charity helped in the demoralisation of children? For, bad as the other is, that is worse for many reasons. And yet in the very doing of our duty as charitable Christians we are all in danger of this if we do not take great care. And now notice another difficulty.

(2.) It is difficult to be charitable without demoralising ourselves. Have you ever thought of that? Our giving may very easily become a species of self-indulgence. It is so easy to be generous if we have it. There is no cheaper way that I know of for a rich man to get a reputation for goodness than that of giving. We are so apt to call a man "good" because he gives. He may not be good at all. It may only be another way of indulging his own egotism. And we are each and all liable, on a smaller scale, to just these dangers of self-demoralisation in our charities. It all depends upon our motive and upon the amount of trouble we take to do the largest amount of good with what we have to give, with the least amount of harm.

And this brings us to what seems to be the root of the whole matter. I mean this: All our difficulties in being charitable arise from the one difficulty of being just.

We want to be—we ought to be—in all our charity not merely just to ourselves, but just to those who receive anything from us, and just to the rest of the community. Now, that is where the real difficulty lies: it is in doing justice. That is the difficult thing. It is much easier to be generous, or pitiful, or compassionate, or sympathetic. And we should be all these. We have not the heart of a man or of a woman in us unless we have these qualities. At the same time we are guilty of wrong if, in obeying these good instincts, we do not take the trouble to keep the higher law of justice in our charity.

What then? Does all this seem to make charity well-nigh impossible? I do not think so; and if I did, we could not alter it, for God has evidently made things to work just in this fashion. He evidently cares for character in human beings most of all. And we ought to do the same. God evidently rules His world on that principle; and we ought to regulate our doings upon the same. It is not easy. But did ever anybody say that real goodness was going to be easy? That is our mistake—the world's mistake—with regard to charity to the poor. We have taken so little trouble about it, that what should have been a good has often become an enormous evil; and all because in emphasising charity we have neglected justice. There is some truth in the somewhat cynical French saying: "Charity causes one half the pauperism it tries to cure, and cannot cure one half the pauperism it causes."

This, then, is about the position we have arrived at in England. There is no lack of money. There is no lack of willingness to give. I believe that at the very heart of most English men and women a real charitable disposition forever abides. But there has also grown up now a sense of responsibility about it all, a serious questioning within yourself as to whether, while appearing to lessen the evil, you are not all the time increasing it. And what is to be done? There are only four rules, any one of which can be, and, I suppose is, by somebody, followed. One is: Give to everybody. Another is: Give to nobody. Another is: Give just when you feel in the mood. Perhaps the majority of people follow the third rule mostly—that is, they are stern one time and soft another. But all these three rules are bad. They are bad because they are unjust, and therefore do more harm than good.

There is, then, the fourth rule, which is: Give only in deserving cases. Ah! yes. That is the right rule, but how difficult to carry out! It needs someone with a heart as tender as a child, a head as clear and shrewd as that of a business man, a will as firm as a rock, and a large knowledge of human nature. Yet on these principles surely—using the word "deserving" in a very wide sense—our charity might be abundantly and wisely distributed; for those of us who take any practical interest in this matter feel keenly how many really deserving cases there are, in justice to whom it behoves us all to cultivate a wiser charity, giving ourselves as well as our gifts, and using our minds as well as our emotions.

J. J. WRIGHT.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

ON Saturday last the annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall. There was a good attendance. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, President, and the proceedings were opened with hymn and prayer.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD (hon. treasurer) presented his financial statement, which showed that expenses and receipts nearly balanced. It was a notable feature that this year, for the first time, all the schools (twenty-three) belonging to the Society had paid their annual subscriptions within the year.

The Committee's report was presented by Mr. A. BARNES (joint hon. secretary). It stated that this being the Jubilee Year of the Society, a special leaflet had been issued to the teachers, giving particulars as to the Society, a statement as to Sunday-school affairs in London fifty years ago, and a short report of an excellent address given by the Rev. J. J. Wright, on the occasion of the aggregate service in the summer. Teachers are wanted at some of the schools. If persons desirous of helping would kindly send their names to the secretaries of the Society at Essex Hall, they would be introduced to appropriate spheres of labour; it was hoped this might appeal especially to teachers and others coming to reside in London. The statistics of the schools appeared to be much the same as last year. The sixth Musical Festival, held this year, had been probably the most successful of the series. The visitation of the schools and other branches of the Society's work, and that of associated Societies, having been alluded to, the report closed with a recommendation of the scheme of a summer session for Sunday-school teachers in connection with Manchester College, Oxford.

Mr. HAROLD WADE (joint hon. sec.) then read the financial statement of the Country Holiday Movement, carried on by the Society. Nearly 500 children had been sent to rural or seaside places, from the different schools and missions; the funds being raised by voluntary subscriptions and contributions from the parents and other friends of the children. A small balance was in hand. Thanks were due to the donors and to the country visitors and all who had assisted in this beneficent and sometimes difficult work.

The PRESIDENT moved the adoption of the reports. He said they bore witness to much excellent work, and to steady progress in several ways. It was natural on these occasions to remember old friends of the movement, such as the late Mr. Jeffery and Mr. I. M. Wade, whose continued vigour was evident from the correspondence in the papers. It was with peculiar feelings of sympathy they all thought of the Rev. R. Spears, who had engaged for half a century in Sunday-school work, and who was now prostrated by severe and painful illness. It would assuredly be grateful to his feelings to know of the sympathy of that meeting, and their prayer was that God's blessing might be with him.

Sir EDWIN DURNING LAWRENCE, who seconded the motion, specially emphasised a remark of the President's, that young teachers should continue endeavouring learning while teaching. He heartily congratulated the Society on its good work, and with deep feeling endorsed the expressions of sympathy that had been made with regard to Mr. Spears.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD made a statement as to the projected summer session for teachers at Oxford. The hope was that a goodly number of teachers might be able to go; the conditions would be adjusted as far as possible to meet the convenience of their teachers, and it was specially gratifying to have met with so much sympathy and guidance from the Principal and Professors of the College. The full particulars will shortly be laid before the teachers.

This motion being carried, the PRESIDENT next moved, and Mr. MACKIE seconded, the election of Mr. F. Lawrence as President for the ensuing year. The other officers were re-elected, and the committee appointed.

Mr. FREDERICK LAWRENCE then gave a short address on some features of "The Religions of the World" as seen by him on his recent travels. In the course of his very attractive sketch—for the anecdotic character of which he apologised, as he had understood he was to have addressed the "elder scholars" that evening—(laughter)—Mr. Lawrence referred in particular to India, China, and Japan. He was struck by the fact that in the East religion is the very life of the people. It was necessary to remember the radical differences between East and West in regard to ethics no less than to religious imagination. As an instance, he would point to the ease with which witnesses in India would perjure themselves in the interests of a friend; their benevolence and social feeling entirely overpassed the claims of veracity. He had met with the kindest, and, indeed, embarrassing attentions, among the members of the Brahmo Somaj. He was sorry their movement was at present split by dissensions which limited its powers for good, and which he hoped would soon be healed. In China, if he might say so, a man was often of a "lot of religions at once." The fact was that Confucianism supplied a code of ethics, and, while Taoism was little more than a propitiation of maleficent powers, Buddhism represented practically the cult of the beneficent powers. Excessive reverence for parents was a marked feature he had observed; and strange as it might appear, this glorification of filial regard to earthly parents was a source of real difficulty, it was found, in the inculcation of the Christian idea of the Fatherhood of God. He was afraid that the Japanese were giving up their old religion without taking to Christianity.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Lawrence was moved by Mr. F. TURNER, seconded by Principal GORDON, and carried by acclamation; and a similar vote to the Chairman concluded the meeting.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bessell's Green.—A special musical service was held at the Old Meeting House last Sunday evening. After worship—and an address by the Rev. R. C. Dendy—musical items were contributed by Mr. Emery, Mr. and Mrs. Hickworth, Mrs. Whitlock, Miss Wood, and the organist, Mr. Banderet. There was an excellent attendance.

Bristol.—The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached at Lewin's Mead last Sunday morning, taking for his subject "The Work of Righteousness in Peace." The sermon is fully reported in the Bristol Mercury of the following day.

Burnley.—On Monday evening the Rev. A. Cobden Smith lectured to the Unitarian Literary Society on "Plato's Ideal Republic." The lecture was followed by an interesting discussion. Councillor Bibby presided.

Dundee.—The members of the Unitarian Christian Church celebrated the thirty-third anniversary of the congregation on Monday last by a social meeting, held in the Church Hall. The minister, the Rev. H. Williamson, presided over the meeting, which was largely attended by members and friends. The chairman, in the course of his address, alluded to the change that had taken place in the religious thought of the people of Scotland since he settled in Dundee as their minister thirty-three years ago. He also spoke hopefully of the future of the church, and the encouragement he had received from the members and friends to go on with the work so dear to the hearts of all true Christians. The secretary of the congregation, Mr. C. Dand, delivered an address, concluding with the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. C. Meldrum, and enthusiastically carried:—"That this meeting of members of the Dundee Unitarian Christian Church congratulate the Rev. Henry Williamson, the minister, on the attainment of his thirty-third anniversary as minister of the congregation, and express their appreciation of his ministrations and work as pastor, teacher, and friend, and the hope that he may be long spared to continue the work so dear to his heart." The resolution also acknowledged the great interest taken by Mr. Williamson in the education of children and young people, both in the church and town. The rest of a very happy and enjoyable evening was spent in listening to songs rendered by members and friends, and one or two dialogues and character sketches by scholars from Rosebank Board School.

Framlingham.—A correspondent who has recently visited Framlingham reports that progress is being made, and that the Rev. Alfred Amey and the Central Postal Mission are to be congratulated. A quarterly list of preachers is prepared, and the plan seems to be working well. There is more social life and a consequent binding together of the people themselves. At Bedford, Mr. Amey's village church, the congregations are large, and the Sunday-school is exceedingly well attended, many of the scholars being quite big boys and girls. The teachers are very earnest in their efforts. As to the congregation, of which a good proportion are men, they are intent and serious people, bestowing the greatest possible attention, and apparently well devoted to the library. In fact it is evident that they know the thing for which they stand. At Framlingham, under the thoughtful superintendence of Mr. Dowsing, the Sunday-school is increasing, and a week-evening life for the children is being found. The congregation is distinctly growing.

Glasgow: South St. Mungo-street.—The annual congregational soiree of the above church was held on the evening of Friday, Feb. 17, when the Rev. E. T. Russell, minister of the church, presided over the largest gathering of recent years. The membership of the church has doubled during the past year, and the prospect is decidedly encouraging. During the evening addresses were delivered by the Chairman, the Rev. A. Lazenby, and Mr. W. Wilson. An excellent programme of songs, interspersed with gramophone selections, was also gone through. Apologies for absence were received from the Rev. R. B. Drummond, B.A., Edinburgh, the Rev. A. C. Henderson, B.D., Paisley, Mrs. C. Soule, Mr. F. Thompson, and Mr. James Graham.

Hull.—An unusually large and enthusiastic meeting of the Literary and Social Union was held on Wednesday week, when, in addition to a most enjoyable programme arranged by Mr. and Mrs. Rymer, there were two very special features. The first of these was the presentation to our minister, the Rev. E. W. Lummis, and Miss E. C. Dixon, on the occasion of their marriage, of a purse of gold, subscribed by the congregation. Miss Dixon is the younger daughter of the late Rev. J. M. Dixon, for many years the much-loved pastor of the congregation—a fact which was alluded to in feeling terms by both Mr. Simon Harris in making the presentation, and Mr. Lummis in returning thanks. Those present then wished a very hearty "god-speed" to Mr. and Mrs. Simon Harris, who start to-day on a tour round the world, and who will be greatly missed in Hull during their absence. The marriage of the Rev. E. W. Lummis and Miss Evelyn C. Dixon took place on Saturday, Feb. 18, in the Park-street Church, which was beautifully decorated. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, assisted by the Rev. J. Hardinge Matthews, of Kingswood, uncle of the bride. On Sunday last the services were conducted by Mr. Arthur Ryland.

Leeds, Hunslet.—The annual bazaar was held on the 16th and 18th insts., and was well attended by members of the neighbouring congregations and other friends. It was opened by Mr. J. S. Mathers, J.P., of Leeds, who was supported by the Revs. C. Hargrove, J. McDowell, and John Fox and Mr. John Thornton, who all took part in the opening proceedings. The Rev. J. S. Slater was also present. Mr. Mathers alluded to the satisfactory financial position of the congregation, and urged that the work of the congregation and its connected institutions must be regarded as so much machinery, with the object of making better men and women. The members must not be content with their meetings for worship, but must go out to do the world's work. On Saturday the bazaar was opened by Mr. E. Dodgson, a member of the Leeds School Board, who said that he had been brought up in the Congregational body, but valued the larger faith and liberty into which he had entered. The Free Church Catechism he regarded as a retrograde movement, and thought that religion consisted more of life than of creed, and should be free from all dogmatic formularies. The proceeds of the sale amounted to over £90, and the congregation desire to thank their friends for the generous help accorded.

London: Hackney.—A memorial brass has been placed in the New Gravel Pit Church by some friends of the late Rev. J. T. Whitehead, to commemorate his twenty-one years' ministry in the church. In announcing last week the acceptance of the Hackney pulpit by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, we were in error in saying that he had already entered on his duties. The appointment dates from Lady Day next, when Mr. Bloor will be leaving Trowbridge.

London: Wood Green.—On Saturday last a social gathering of the members and friends was held at Unity Hall. There were 150 present, and about twenty failures owing to the very heavy fog. Very conspicuous in a Unitarian assembly are the resources of the people for interesting and amusing one another by conversation, recitation, music, and song.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The congregation remained after the close of morning service on Sunday last to express its sympathy with Mr. T. Smith Osler in his bereavement in the death of his wife. Mrs. Osler was a daughter of the late Rev. J. J. Tayler, and although the congregation has entirely changed at Brook-street since the time of his long pastorate there, yet in the continuing consciousness of congregational life his former association with the church is held in honour and esteem, and the death of his daughter recalls again the great name of him whose hold on the affections of our forefathers is attested by the beautiful memorials which adorn our church. Mrs. Osler herself was known to some of the present members of the church who bore testimony to her continued interest in the congregation with which her father's name is so closely associated.

Nantwich.—The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., conducted a devotional service, and lectured on "The Story of St. Francis of Assisi," on Wednesday last in the chapel. The congregation was an improvement on previous week-evening gatherings, and Mr. Hargrove's lecture was listened to with great interest.

Newton Abbot.—The Rev. C. A. Greaves preached last Sunday evening on "Repentance and What to Repent of." There was an attendance of sixty-five.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—On Monday evening, Feb. 20, a lecture was delivered at Ashington, the largest mining village in Northumberland, by the Rev. Arthur Harvie on "The Religion of the Seventeenth Century." Mr. H. Sutcliffe, of Gateshead, presided. The audience, though small, listened most attentively, and at the close of the lecture showed their appreciation by a very hearty round of applause.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association Lay Preachers' Union.—A meeting of the above was held in the schoolroom of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle, on Thursday last, when the Rev. Frank Walters took the chair. A religious service was conducted by Mr. J. Duncan Donald, and a paper read by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, entitled "Marcus Aurelius, Emperor, Philosopher, and Saint."

Rotherham.—On Sunday week the Rev. W. Stephens preached in the Church of Our Father on the subject of the Tsar's Rescript. The sermon was reported in the Rotherham Advertiser, and was noticed in an editorial.

Stockport.—The annual choir sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Bolton, who preached in the evening on "The Influence of Music."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES	141
ADVERTISEMENTS	142

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE members of the English Church Union have taken a decided stand in the matter of the present crisis in the Church. If the Archbishops venture to interpret the rubrics in a sense contrary to their view of Catholic usage, they are evidently prepared to rebel; and if Parliament should interfere and attempt any further regulation of spiritual matters in the Church, they will accept disestablishment and disendowment rather than submit. What would then happen in the Church, or in the various fragments of the Church, which would remain, who can say?

THE members of the Union, after attending an early celebration in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday morning, met at Cannon-street Hotel, and adopted a memorial to the Queen, which is to be sent also to the Archbishops and others. The memorial claims unbroken continuity for the Church of England, as a branch of the Catholic Church, and the right to use all observances that were practised in the Church before the Reformation, unless they are expressly forbidden in the Prayer-book. The bishops are earnestly begged not to use their spiritual power "to curtail the glory and the splendour of the services of God's House on earth by imposing on the Church a narrow and disputed interpretation of the rubrics." The position of the Union is clearly stated in the following passage :—

We have asserted, and we assert again, that the Church of England cannot consistently with her principles release herself from the obligations imposed upon her by her relation to the rest of the Catholic Church.

We have maintained, and we shall continue to maintain, that the doctrine, discipline, and ceremonial of the Church of England, as they have at any time, during the course of her history, been prescribed by her, remain in force and operation except in such specific instances as they have been changed by her own authority.

We have denied, and we deny again, that a new religious establishment was set up in England in the sixteenth century.

We have denied, and we deny again, the right of the Crown or of Parliament to determine the doctrine, the discipline, and the ceremonial of the Church of England.

We are content, if need be, to suffer for these things, and to suffer gladly. What we are not content to do is to sacrifice the rights and liberties of the Church of England to popular clamor and ignorant prejudice.

If the nation, at a moment when the Church is doing more for souls both at home and abroad than at any previous time, is no longer prepared to recognise the Church of England on the lines which have always been hers, so it must be. We shall protest against the spoliation of the Church, but we are not prepared to barter the principles of the Church for the sake either of Establishment or Endowment.

THE General Committee of the Congregational Union have finally adopted a scheme for the raising of a Twentieth Century Fund of half a million guineas. The object of the fund is stated to be "the planting of new places of worship in new and needy districts, and the strengthening of denominational work at home and abroad." It is hoped that half a million Congregationalists will raise (by gift or collection) as many guineas, and in that case the fund is to be allocated as follows :—

1. For Foreign and Colonial Missions, a sum not exceeding £100,000.
2. For Church Extension, £150,000.
3. For the extinction of debts upon chapel and school buildings, £50,000.
4. For the Church-Aid Society toward the maintenance of the weaker churches, including at least £75,000 for the support of the ministry during the early years of new churches, £100,000.
5. For the Pastors' Retiring Fund, £50,000.
6. For the extinction of the debt remaining on the Memorial Hall, £25,000.
7. For the colleges, schools and settlements, and for other objects which in the judgment of the Special Committee may appear to be desirable in the interests of the denomination, £50,000.

The Wesleyans are to raise a million from three million adherents, and it is reckoned that the Congregationalists have a million and a half adherents, so that their effort is in the same proportion.

WE have received a copy of a frank Letter to Evangelical Free Churchmen, by a "Unitarian Christian," on the subject of the New Catechism. The letter, which makes a sixteen-page pamphlet (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1d.), is written with full appreciation of the significance of what is attempted in the Catechism, and rejoices in the emphasis it lays at the outset on the great truth of the Fatherhood of God. But then passing to other points the writer shows what difficulties are presented to the child's mind by various statements as to the nature and functions of Jesus, and by the Trinitarian clauses. The question of the Bible is also dealt with, and there is an emphatic passage on the attempt to draw men of different Churches into unity by ambiguous phrases, which only conceal divergent conceptions of religious truth. The letter will no doubt be widely circulated, and should be in the hands of all those who are responsible for the Catechism. We commend it also to the attention of Postal Mission Workers, as likely to be of service in their field.

At the conclusion of his letter on the New Catechism, the writer adds the following conclusions, impressed upon one who is no stranger to the difficulties of theological definition, and sees those difficulties "writ large" in the Catechism :—

(i.) The cause of Christian co-operation in promoting God's kingdom on earth is not helped, but hindered, by insisting on the adherence of all members of the brotherhood to a common standard of belief.

(ii.) The cause of truth is not helped, but hindered, by using language in a double sense rather than allow for the existence and honest utterance of opinions which must differ as men differ in gifts, education, and spiritual experience.

(iii.) The cause of righteousness on earth is not helped, but hindered, by closing our eyes or hearts in any degree to the world-wide forces that work together for good under Divine Providence.

And in a final appeal, he adds :—

You cannot let the unfortunate example of this Catechism pervert your sense of intellectual right and wrong; but, as heretofore, you will prefer to say forth to men what you truly believe, in the simplest and clearest language that you can find. You will not suppose that the God of all truth is served by dexterous phraseology which may mean much or little, this thing or the opposite. You have faith to believe that He who speaks in your heart will in His own time and way reconcile all the differences of honest men, and lead all faithful minds ever nearer to the eternal light.

WE understand that a copy of this letter, together with the two sermons by the Rev. Charles Hargrove on the same subject in the Mill Hill Pulpit, "A Welcome" and "A Protest," is being sent to each of the ministers whose name appears in the "Essex Hall Year Book." Both letter and sermons will be read to most advantage in connection with the Catechism itself, and will furnish much useful material for discussion and instruction, both in the pulpit and in class.

A LETTER from Dr. Brooke Herford appeared in last week's Spectator, correcting a statement made in that journal on Feb. 18 in an article on "Wholesale Conversion." We have made further reference to the matter in our leading article to-day, and simply reproduce here the greater part of Dr. Herford's letter:—"Speaking of the weakening of 'the sense of the necessity for correlating faith with action,' you say: 'There are, for example, thousands of Unitarians within the English Establishment, yet the Unitarian Church as a body of avowed believers in the humanity of Christ is rapidly dying away.' The first statement I will not dispute. You probably know more about Latitudinarianism within the Church than I do. Nor need I argue about the alleged moribund condition of Unitarianism in its avowed and organised form. That it was 'rapidly dying away' was urged upon me by orthodox friends fifty years ago as a reason for my not going into the Unitarian Ministry. And ever since the parrot-cry has been repeated so often and so confidently that by this time I should have almost come to believe it, were it not that throughout these fifty years, as any one can verify who cares, our lists of churches, our organisations, our subscriptions for constantly enlarging activities, have kept showing slow but unmistakable growth. But a more serious correction is required by the words I have italicised. So far as a church-life which has always refused to base itself on any 'avowed belief' can be defined, our central and special 'belief' is and always has been, as our commonly accepted name indicates—the simple Unity and Fatherhood of God, as distinguished from any doctrine of the Trinity. With regard to Christ, your mistake is one both in fact and in theory; for while the most, in our English churches, are, I think, humanitarians, some in England, and many in our Irish, American, and Transylvanian churches are distinctly Arian. But the chief point is that we regard all such differences as minor matters in Christianity, compared with that reverent discipleship which may, and does, co-exist with every variety of Christological theory, from that of the Nicene Creed to that of Channing or Martineau."

THE winter Conference of the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union was held, as usual, at Nongtáláng on Dec. 24, 25, and 26, 1898. A good number of Unitarians, both men and women, came from Jowai. On Saturday evening, the 24th, there was a reception meeting, and on Sunday there were two meetings in the church: Sermons were preached by U. Khro Shyrmang (layman), and Mar Singh (mission worker), and in the second by U. Hajom Kissor Singh (layman), and the Rev. David Edwards. Both meetings were well attended. The doors and windows were crowded with villagers who came rather from curiosity than to hear what was said. The sermons were earnest and uplifting, all the preachers urging the need of cultivating the spiritual life, and of the superiority of the spiritual over the temporal. The Khasi Unitarians having passed through the first stage, which was the forsaking of the demon worship and adopting the worship of the One True God, they should now enter the next stage of cultivating their religious nature and strengthening their organisation by mutual help and love. In the evening there was a singing procession through the thoroughfares of the village, in the course of which there was open-air preaching in three different places. In the night a board meeting was held, and the treasurer read a statement of receipts and expenditure of the Union's Fund up to Dec. 22, 1898, as follows:—Receipts, Rs. 84 $\frac{5}{8}$; expenditure, Rs. 81 $\frac{1}{8}$. At the last meeting of the Conference on Monday morning it was resolved to send greetings to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, U.S.A., the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, English missionary to India, the members of the Brahmo Somaj, and all the Unitarians in the Khasi Hills.

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Protection of Birds was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Westminster Palace Hotel, Sir Edward Grey, M.P., in the chair. There are 152 branches of the Society, with over 20,000 members. The campaign against the wearing of ospreys continues, and yet in 1898 nearly 35,000 birds of paradise and 2,200 packages of osprey plumes were sold in six days at auction. Commenting on this, the Daily Chronicle said:—

That smart hats still show the egret plume and Paradise tail; that the dinner-table of people who would be sorry to be called cruel or insensible still shows us larks en aspic, is no reason to believe that progress has not been made by the Protection of Birds Society. It may be freely admitted that the charge of brutality, of inflicting cruel suffering, has completely failed to affect the mind of the fashionable woman. No one who knew the fashionable woman ever ventured to hope that it would affect her. The woman whom such a suggestion does affect plucks the "osprey" from her hat and vows never to wear another, but she is seldom the "smart" person whose toque must be ever du dernier cri. Many beautiful hats, of undeniable mode, are constructed without any of these scandalously obtained feathers upon them. The women members of the Society for the Protection of Wild Birds would be well advised to display only the most becoming of head-gear upon their persons. Beyond that, legislation is all that can be looked to.

THE unexpected death of Lord Herschell, at Washington, is deeply to be regretted, as ending a distinguished career of great usefulness at a comparatively early age, and especially as interrupting his work as President of the Anglo-American Commission. Lord Herschell was the son of a London Congregational minister, the Rev. R. H. Herschell, a German convert from Judaism. An uncle, also a Congregational minister, is still living in retirement at Brixton. Farrar Herschell, who became an earnest member of the Church of England, had a distinguished career at the Bar, and entered Parliament in 1874 as member for Durham city. In 1880 he became Solicitor-General under Mr. Gladstone, and was Lord Chancellor in the last two Governments of his great chief. In another sphere he succeeded the late Earl Granville as Chancellor of the London University, of which he was one of the most distinguished graduates.

THE Rev. James Hocart, the oldest minister of the French Methodist Conference, who died somewhat suddenly at Paris on Feb. 17, was the father of our friend and correspondent, M. Hocart, of the Liberal Protestant Church of Brussels. This venerable man was a native of Guernsey, and was born in 1812. His parents were attached to the Church of England, but while at school at Southampton he was attracted to the Methodists, and on his return home joined that body. At the age of twenty-two he entered the Methodist ministry in France, at that time under the direction of Dr. Cooke, and was still vigorous in the sixty-fifth year of his active service, and the eighty-seventh of his age, when the summons came. The greater part of his ministry was exercised in various parts of France, though for eight years he was in the Channel Isles, and for twelve years at Lausanne, where he was at the head of a theological college. For the last twenty-five years he was in Paris. On settling there in 1874, as a widower, he asked one of his daughters, who was then engaged in religious work in London, to take charge of his household. She consented on condition that she might bring with her three orphan girls, and this was the beginning of the Children's Home which father and daughter founded in Paris. The parsonage was soon too small for the children of whom they took charge, and special buildings both for girls and boys had to be provided. At the time of M. Hocart's death there were sixty orphans under his care, and twenty-five others had gone out into the world. For this beneficent work he himself, by his wide personal influence, raised the funds, while to the children both he and his daughter stood in the closest home relations. He was a man of very broad popular sympathies, combining intellectual strength with great fervour. Among his grateful hearers he numbered persons of the highest social rank in Parisian society, and at the other extreme some of the poorest of the poor. He was an indefatigable worker to the last, having preached twice on the Sunday before his death, and conducted his usual catechumen class only two days before the Friday evening when he died. A good and faithful servant has entered into rest; to his son our heartfelt sympathy goes out.

A MEMORIAL service will be held on Sunday morning in the Highgate Unitarian Christian Church, in memory of the late Rev. Robert Spears. The service will be conducted by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A. Mrs. Spears, on behalf of herself and family, wishes to acknowledge most gratefully the numerous letters of sympathy and appreciation of her late husband, to which she is unable to reply individually.

It is not good that a man should batter day and night at the gate of heaven. Sometimes he can do nothing else, and then nothing else is worth doing; but the very noise of the seige will sometimes drown the still small voice that calls from the open postern. There is a door wide to the jewelled wall not far from anyone of us, even when he least can find it.—Geo. Macdonald.

WISDOM FROM THE FAR EAST.

WHEN three strangers meet in China, reported the Abbé Huc half a century ago, it is the custom for each to ask his neighbour "To what sublime religion do you belong?" The first is, perhaps, a Confucian, the second a Taoist, the third a follower of the Buddha. Each then begins to pronounce a panegyric upon the religion not his own; after which they repeat in chorus "Religions are many, reason is one, we are all brothers;" or, according to a common formula, san kiao y kiao; "the three religions are but one."

This view is not modern, it is many centuries old. More than a thousand years ago a distinguished Buddhist scholar wrote a treatise on the "Agreement of the Three Religions," and recited the opinion of the elders in these terms: "Lu Shun Yang declares that the teaching of the sects is not different; the catholic-minded man regards them as embodying the same truths; the narrow-minded man observes only their differences." When another famous Buddhist teacher of an earlier date was asked if he was a Buddhist, he pointed to his Confucian slippers. "Are you a Confucian?"—he signed to his Taoist cap. "A Taoist, then?"—he reminded his questioner that he wore a Buddhist robe.

Such sayings as these carry us into a different moral and religious atmosphere. I am not about now either to justify or condemn them. But while the colossal decay of China constitutes one of the great tragic spectacles of our time, it may be worth while to recall some of the sayings of her most distinguished thinkers which can never lose their interest for human thought. Of the two great sages, Lao-Tsze and Confucius, who were both alive when Cyrus captured Babylon, Lao-Tsze, the elder by perhaps fifty years, is the less known. But a number of Western scholars have occupied themselves recently with the interpretation of the remarkable little book, the "Tao Teh King, the Book of the Way of Virtue," which bears his name. Latest among these is Dr. Paul Carus, of Chicago, who has recently published the text with a translation.* Dr. Carus naturally stands on the labours of several predecessors. He is anxious, moreover, to do his utmost to enable the reader to follow him. Accordingly he not only prints the Chinese text before his own rendering, but he reproduces the Chinese text again a second time with a transliteration of the characters, and their literal English equivalents. The student who may wish to compare one passage with another, and trace the usage of particular words, will be grateful for this aid, but it was surely needless to print the Chinese text twice over. The result is curious. On the one hand, Dr. Carus thinks that his method "will enable almost everybody to fall back on the original Chinese, and to verify or revise the translation here proposed." Yet, on the same page (47), he affirms that "it lies in the nature of this work that the number of those men who can judge of its merits and demerits is very limited." We do not profess to be among these. But we cannot feel that the help of a couple of Japanese scholars, or an occasional reference to an American missionary, or even the use of five dictionaries, is an adequate equipment for the difficulties of the task, or entitles Dr. Carus to speak disparagingly of the late Professor Legge, whose knowledge of Chinese language and literature, and especially of the Taoist commentaries, was far more comprehensive. Some other scholars, like Mr. Herbert Giles or M. de Rosny, might have deserved mention; the interpreter needs light from every source; one cannot understand Lao-Tsze's fundamental ideas in light-hearted ease.

At the outset we are confronted with a huge difficulty. The religion connected with Lao-Tsze's name is commonly called Taoism. The teacher himself was believed to have apprehended the Tao. What, then, is the Tao? By common consent the word means path, way, road, or course: the great Tao meant the high road as distinguished from by-paths. The term had already gained a recognised place in older Chinese literature, applied to what we call the "course" of Nature. The Tao of heaven denoted the sum of the actions and energies of the sky conceived as itself living, impartially surveying and embracing all. The Tao of the earth, in like manner, expressed the totality of the earth's potencies in their regular operation. Thus the unwearied activity of the universe, according to unchanging law, was summed up in the conception of the Tao. But that Tao was, in a sense, visible. The sky and earth are seen; the objects which they contain can be classified, and their relations ascertained. They are the matter of our knowledge; along their course we take our daily way, and their order supplies the outward basis of our morality. But the path we tread is something derived and secondary: it is not itself the ultimate reality, it is only its manifestation. The Tao that is seen is as a veil over the Tao that is not seen. Like Tenryson in our own day, Lao-Tsze twenty-four centuries ago discovered behind the things we name the Nameless out of which they issue, and into which they return. So the first aphorism of Lao-Tsze's little book runs (according to Dr. Legge):—"The Tao that can be trodden (literally tao'ed) is not the enduring and unchanging Tao: the name that can be named is not the enduring and unchanging name." Dr. Carus has not persuaded us that the technical term Tao can be properly rendered "Reason." Here is his rendering: "The Reason that can be reasoned is not the eternal Reason." Reason appears often to be too limited a term for what more nearly corresponds with the Absolute of the modern philosopher (cf. chaps. viii. 1, xiv., xviii. 1, xxv. 2-4, and other passages). On the other hand in ix. 2, lxxvii., lxxxi., where the "way" or behaviour of man is contrasted with that of heaven, reason seems again inappropriate for that which is rather conduct or mode of action.

The most interesting applications of Lao-Tsze's thought are in the sphere of ethics. He was deeply moved by the spectacle of the untiring activity of Nature, its uniformity, and its beneficence. The silence, the impartiality of its action, made for him the foundation of a striking ethical type. He who would follow the Tao must learn to act with the unchanging quietness and forbearance displayed by Heaven and earth. "If I were suddenly to become known," said the philosopher, "and put into a position to conduct government according to the great Tao, what I should be most afraid of would be boastful display." Self-control, detachment from the world, freedom from self-seeking—these were the characteristics of the man who lived by the Tao. "Mighty is he who conquers himself"—so one of his disciples represented him as saying—"to the good I would be good, to the not-good I would also be good in order to make them good." Confucius, indeed, found his doctrine too hard. When he heard Lao-Tsze's great saying, "Recompense injury with kindness," he pleaded, "What, then, will you return for good?" The teacher of "Reciprocity" could get no further than to say "Recompense injury with justice, and return good for good."

But the maxim of Lao-Tsze was not lost. The religion which now bears the name of Taoism has little indeed in common with the philosopher's thought. It is enveloped in a cloud of magic and alchemy, and has incorporated into itself a crowd of beliefs and practices of the most superstitious kind. But one of its fundamental conceptions, the absence of self-seeking in the Tao as expressed in the action of Heaven and earth, goes sounding on through the writings of the Chinese sages. One of these teachers, Mi-tze, contemporary with Aristotle, has just found a translator in the veteran scholar M. de Harlez.* Mi-tze was an officer in one of the little feudatory states which then composed the Chinese Empire. It was in curious contrast with the aim of his philosophy that he acquired a special reputation for the arts of fortification and defence. Taking up the ancient theme of the beneficent order of the universe, he draws from it important moral consequences. "The action of Heaven extends to all," he pleaded, "and has no egoism or caprice. Its generosity is boundless, and knows no special favours." What is the immediate inference? "Heaven desires that men should love and benefit each other instead of hating and injuring one another." How do we know that this is Heaven's will? "Because it embraces all in one and the same love, in the same favour. It maintains all beings without exception. For it there are neither large kingdoms nor little; everything is the city of Heaven. For it there are neither children nor adults, neither rich nor poor, neither great nor small; everyone is a servant of Heaven."

Whence, then, come the disorders which disturb our peace—the quarrels in families, the crimes of violence, the aggressions of states? "Their cause," answered Mi-tze, "is the want of mutual love. . . . If in this world all men loved each other universally, if men loved others as themselves, if fathers, brothers, and princes considered their children, their brothers, and their subjects as their own persons, there would be no more wars between states, no more quarrels between families, there would be no thieves or murderers. Princes and subjects, parents and children, would practise piety and charity, and perfect order would prevail throughout the world." Only let this principle be established, and eye and ear will no longer see and hear for themselves alone; men will become wise and give each other mutual instruction and warning. Then the aged who have no wives or children will find maintenance in their last days, and orphans will be provided with support so that they can grow up in happiness and accomplish their destiny. But the difficulty is that universal love is not yet recognised as the true remedy for the world's ills. It is strange, says Mi-tze, that when the educated have heard of it, they should still reject it. They may admit it to be useful in theory, but they ask how it is to be put in practice. It is simple enough, answers Mi-tze. Look at two educated people, one of whom follows acceptance of persons, and the other universal charity. The first, seeing another suffering hunger, gives him nothing to eat; pierced with cold, he does not clothe him; sick, he does not tend him; dead, he does not bury him (a peculiarly Chinese touch!) But the second feeds the hungry, clothes the cold, cares for the sick, and buries the dead.

The principles of Mi-tze did not prevail, any more than the "each for himself" philosophy of his contemporary Yang Chu, who seems to have surpassed even Thomas Hobbes in his preference for might over right. The polemic of Mencius (B.C. 372-289), the famous disciple of Confucius, strove after an ethical mean between the two, and the teacher of "universal love" fell into the shade. The little book in which his views survive is but a part of a larger collection of which the rest is lost; and even to-day it is extremely difficult to procure. It is among the strange and pathetic coincidences of history that a philosophy of "universal love" should have been propounded in China nearly four hundred years before the Sermon on the Mount. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Making of an Apostle, by R. J. Campbell, is No. XI. of "Small Books on Great Subjects." Those who desire a simple setting forth of the history of Peter, as recorded in all four Gospels, from his first acquaintance with Jesus until the events recorded in John xxi., will find it in this little book. But the book does not seem to us to be equal to some other volumes in the series to which it belongs. There is nothing very striking either in Mr. Campbell's style or in the lessons which he draws. His point of view is for the most part conservative and uncritical. The harmonist's task presents no difficulties to him. He accepts without question the genuineness of the so-called Second Epistle of Peter, to which he refers three times; but, having set out to describe only the "making" of the Apostle, Mr. Campbell breaks off when that process is complete, and has little to say of Peter's subsequent activities. And there is no word of his relations with Paul, or his attitude in the Gentile controversy. Considering the professed scope of the volume, no fault can be found with the author on this account, but it certainly gives it a fragmentary character. Still, the spirit of the book is good; and the manner in which Jesus dealt with his impulsive, wayward, and for a time ambitious follower is well brought out. (James Clarke and Co. 1s. 6d.)

The Ordeal of Faith, by the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, is another of the "small books," and contains six sermons on the Book of Job. They are full of helpful suggestions, especially for such as have hitherto read that marvellous book without trying to guess its meaning as a whole.

There is no discussion of the mechanism of the book, but a ministry of consolation is set forth, on the assumption that "the supreme sorrow lies in loss of faith." The author does not regard the "Adversary," asking "Does Job fear God for nought?" as a messenger, who, with divine approval, simply tested the integrity of mortals, but adopts the more widespread notion of a spirit of evil desiring Job's fall. Thus the first discourse relates to the "Cynic as Prophet," and affords an opportunity for condemning the too prevalent attitude in our generation of those who see among mankind two classes only—the hypocritically and the openly corrupt. Job denied the old theory of the connection between suffering and sin, but had no new explanation to offer. He simply refused to own a sin he was not conscious of. He would not be dragged to the "penitent form" to save his theological reputation. The author displays his insight into the meaning of the book in pointing out that when the Almighty came forth to intervene He neither condemned Job for his defiant doubting, nor bestowed commendation on the friends for their defence of the accepted notions. The truth does not rest with them. More worthy the man who boldly faces his own sorrows and waits for the light. In his agony of mind Job may say "Better not live," but never, "If you have to live, it is better to be bad than good." He never loses faith in righteousness. (James Clarke and Co. 1s. 6d.)

A PARALLEL.

In the Institutes of the Roman Emperor Justinian we read: "All nations who are ruled by laws and customs are governed partly by their own particular laws, and partly by those laws which are common to all mankind. The law which a people enacts is called the Civil Law of that people; but that which natural reason appoints for all mankind is called the Law of Nations, because all nations use it."

This idea of a body of unwritten laws "common to all mankind" plays a very important part in the history of Roman Law, and, indeed, of the legal systems of all the modern European States. This unwritten code in its earlier stages, was known as the jus gentium, or "Law of Nations."

It owed its origin to the fact that a large proportion of the population of Rome and her territory, from an early age in the city's annals, consisted of foreigners. To these foreigners the privileges of Roman citizenship were not extended: consequently they had no rights under the Civil Law. Yet the dictates of policy—and probably the Roman's innate sense of justice—required that these aliens (whose commerce was a valuable possession to the city) should not appeal altogether in vain to the authorities for justice. Hence it became necessary to assume jurisdiction in disputes to which the parties were either foreigners, or a native and a foreigner. In deciding upon what principles to base this new body of law, "the expedient to which they resorted," says Sir H. S. Maine, "was that of selecting the rules of law common to Rome and to the different Italian communities in which the immigrants were born." The jus gentium, therefore—to adopt Maine's succinct description—was "the sum of the common ingredients in the customs of the old Italian tribes; for they were all the nations whom the Romans had the means of observing."

Later, after the conquest of Greece, the Greek philosophy became popular in Rome. Under its influence, the "Law of Nations" lapsed, by an imperceptible transition, into the "Law of Nature," which, as Maine well says, "is simply the jus gentium or Law of Nations, seen in the light of a peculiar theory." This theory was that, in his primitive state, man had been governed by a code or system of laws at once simple, symmetrical, and universally applicable; and that, by degrees, the various races had, each in its several ways, and by its own peculiar institutions, corrupted that primal law. The Praetors, therefore, in whose tribunal the affairs of aliens were dealt with, and who had for a long time administered the jus gentium, which they had themselves created or compiled, came to be regarded as "gradually restoring a type from which law had only departed to deteriorate." And "the inference," continues the distinguished writer from whom I have so largely quoted, "from this belief, was immediate, that it was the Praetor's duty to supersede the Civil Law as much as possible by the Edict; to revive, as far as might be, the institutions by which Nature had governed man in the primitive state." The jus honorarium (as the Praetor's law was termed) was, from the first, characterised by simplicity, liberality, and comprehensiveness. These advantages became still more manifest from a comparison with the cumbrous and artificial system which the Roman citizens had reserved for their own exclusive use; inasmuch that from time to time the Civil Law was reformed very largely upon the model of the Praetor's Edict.

And now let us turn to a very different topic. Who is there—no matter what his creed—who has not at times felt, during the hour of worship, oppressed and perplexed by the thought that, at that very moment, countless numbers of his fellow men were offering up their prayers and praises in ways differing alike from his and from one another's—each of them, more or less devoutly, deeming his own religion the only true one? Yet all cannot be right. Must all therefore be wrong?

Men there doubtless are who have at once accepted this alternative; but a far greater number, I believe, have sought and found some via media—some compromise between these conflicting views.

By the Unitarian (using the term to express its negative aspect, as signifying one who subscribes to no creed, and binds his conscience by no dogma) such an attitude may be freely and consistently assumed.

To him it is open to pursue the problem—to try to reconcile the conflicting elements which he finds in all religions, even in his own. And to one possessing this noble franchise—to think and inquire with absolute freedom—how is it possible that the belief in a Beneficent Father of all men should not imply also a belief that in every man's soul there is the potentiality of real communion with his Heavenly Father, and that, whatever outward shape his religion may wear, it has within it at least some pure gold amid the dross—in other words, that part of each man's religion is essential, the rest of it accidental?

This thought it is which has suggested the analogy between such a concept of religion and the ancient Roman's theory of the Law of Nature. One may apply to this idea of a Universal Religion the very words which Maine has used in relation to the ius naturale, and "speak of the common ingredient as being of the essence . . . and stigmatise the remaining apparatus of ceremony, which varied in different communities, as adventitious and accidental."

How pitiable is the spectacle of some god-gifted spirit beating its wings against the bars within which dogma and tradition have encaged it! To take one example only. Look at Montesquieu, and note the struggle in his breast as he pens those books of his "Esprit des Lois," which deal with the relations between Law and Religion.

See how the philosopher is galled by the shackles of his master, the priest! Mark the pity in his voice as he speaks of those nations which "have the misfortune to have a religion which God has not given"—the sad reluctance with which he classes the Stoics and others among those hapless beings whose virtues can hope for no reward beyond this life! Can we not detect in the following passage a secret assent to the doctrine which he is stating as that of a barbarian race—a secret protest against the bigotry of his own "Catholic" faith? "Les points principaux de la religion de ceux de Pégu, sont de ne point tuer, de ne point voler, d'éviter l'impudicité, de ne faire aucun déplaisir à son prochain, de lui faire, au contraire, tout le bien qu'on peut. Avec cela ils croient qu'on se sauvera dans quelque religion que ce soit; ce qui fait que ces peuples, quoique fiers et pauvres, ont de la douceur et de la compassion pour les malheureux."

To such a one as Montesquieu, how sad, how dejecting—to the Unitarian, how joyful, how inspiring, to read in the great writings of the world—of Bhudda, of Mahomet, of the Greek philosophers, and their Roman followers, of Jew, of Catholic, and of Protestant alike—those precepts which all admit to be good in their essence, though all may not allow their efficacy as means of grace, unaccompanied by the shibboleth of Orthodoxy.

How many would gladly, if they dared, believe, with the Unitarian, that

As each beholds in cloud and fire
The shape that answers his own desire,
So each, said the youth, in the Law shall find
The figure and fashion of his mind;
And to each, in His mercy, hath God allowed
His several pillar of fire and cloud.

Happy natives of Pegu! It was even of such that St. Paul wrote to the Romans: "For when Gentiles which have no law, do by nature the things of the law, these, having no law, are a law unto themselves; in that they show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them."

Is it visionary to hope that, as, before the march of Science, the forces of Time and Space recede, ignorance, dogma, and bigotry will dwindle; and that more light will bring more love? My analogy may be pushed one step further before I conclude. The Law of Nature, built up of the essential, and rejecting the accidental, infused into the Roman Civil Law that breadth and elasticity and vigour which have made it the model and basis of most of the legislation of subsequent times. May not some such religion as has been hinted at above—"Catholic" in the widest and truest sense—essentially spiritual and universal, even while infinitely varying in its outward manifestations—may not such a Church of Humanity one day welcome all men within its fold!

OBITUARY.

THE REV. ROBERT SPEARS.

We regret to announce the death, on Saturday last, of the Rev. Robert Spears. His illness had not been a very long one, but it was severely painful, and his passing away came as a welcome release.

Mr. Spears occupied a prominent position for many years, and his public record is a long and chequered one. He was born Sept. 25, 1825, at Leamington, a Tyneside colliery village, his parents being of humble position. As a boy he attended a Presbyterian meeting some miles from home, but later came under the influence of the parish clergyman to whose memory he paid grateful regard. The real religious home of his youth, however, was found among the Methodists, several branches of whom were represented in the village. Ultimately he threw in his lot with the New Connexion, and having made the most of his scanty opportunities of book-learning he was able at twenty-one to take the position of schoolmaster at the New Connexion School at Scotswood—a village a little nearer Newcastle than his old home. This was in 1846, which was also the year of his first marriage. He proved a welcome speaker at the chapels in the district, and was soon urged to qualify as a local preacher. His Bible-reading, however, had already led him towards the Unitarian position, and he declined to answer official questions on his "views" except "in the words of Scripture." Notwithstanding his heresies, he was permitted to continue his work among the New Connexion—including a Sunday-school which he had founded; but in 1849, having come under the influence of the celebrated Unitarian preacher, the Rev. George Harris, he avowed himself a Unitarian and began preaching as such under the direction of Mr. Harris. In 1852 he settled in charge of the congregation at Sunderland. His missionary zeal and courage, characteristic of his whole career, are evinced in the fact that he had no stipend, but was obliged to support himself and his family by teaching. He remained six years at Sunderland, and, after a brief but eventful pastorate at Stockton-on-Tees, he accepted a call to Stamford-street, Blackfriars, London, in 1861.

Mr. Spears was in the prime of his strength during the ensuing years; and he devoted himself ardently to the propagation of the faith as he conceived it. He had come to be a Unitarian not through the solvent processes of "modern thought," but as a simple student of the English text of Scripture. His early associations with Methodism had imbued him with a fervent enthusiasm somewhat novel if not altogether uncongenial to the older school of "English Presbyterians." On the other hand, their broader sympathies and love of high intellectual culture were something new to him. Considering this division of feeling it is a remarkable testimony to the high value set upon his labours that in 1867 he was associated with the Rev. R. Brook Aspland in the secretaryship of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On Mr. Aspland's death in 1869, Mr. Spears was appointed sole secretary. In its earlier period the business of the Association had been very limited; but in a short time, under the new direction, it took a great leap forward. Among the special features of his period of office may be mentioned the issue of the cheap shilling edition of Channing's works, which had a very large circulation, and the raising of the Jubilee Fund of 1875.

We come now to what proved a painful episode in the career of Mr. Spears, and one fruitful in troublesome results. In 1876 he resigned the secretaryship of the Association, owing to the decision to include Theodore Parker's works among its publications, in spite of his vehement opposition to that course. His devotion to the work of the Association, and of the Unitarian cause generally, was thereupon recognised in the presentation to him of an address, accompanying the sum of nearly £2,000, subscribed by representatives of all shades of opinion. The breach did not close there, however; and in the same year the Christian Life was founded by Mr. Spears, and some of his sympathisers, with the aim of exposing and counteracting the spread amongst Unitarians of that "anti-supernaturalism" which they deplored. Of this journal, which he continued to edit up to his death, and of the controversies associated with his later career, this is not the time to speak.

In spite of his labours, secretarial or editorial, Mr. Spears continued active in the ministry. In 1875 he left Stamford-street, and became minister, under the London District Unitarian Society, to a new congregation gathered by himself at Stepney; and in 1886 before quite relinquishing this post he entered on the formation of another new congregation at Highgate, of which he continued minister till his death. In connection with Highgate his help in the work of founding and managing the Channing House School for girls calls for special mention.

Besides being occupied with his "regular ministry," Mr. Spears was generally busy in assisting off-shoots and sporadic movements towards forming new congregations. On the removal of the Carter-lane congregation to Islington, he took an active share in securing the continuance of the congregation's work among the poor by the establishment of the Blackfriars Mission. From Stepney he sent out three pioneers through whose labours, most generously supported by Miss J. Durning Smith, the Limehouse Mission has grown to very great usefulness. It would be difficult to define the real area of his influence as a promoter of Unitarian churches; he had something to do with a great many, and a great deal to do with a considerable number. The formation of the new churches at Walthamstow and Southend bear witness to the persistence of his missionary zeal in his latest years. The number of religious societies and trusts with which he was associated was very large; and he took an active part in many public movements.

Mr. Spears was an incessant publisher.

Besides the Christian Life, he founded the Christian Freeman, in 1856; and the Stockton Gazette (now the North-Eastern Gazette), in 1859. His leaflets and "declarations" numbered hundreds of thousands. He compiled a volume of "Unitarian Worthies" and a Unitarian Handbook. But nothing from his own pen can be accounted of so much service as his reproductions of the writings of others, amongst which the diffusion of Channing's works takes the highest place.

Mr. Spears not seldom lamented the narrow limits of his education and the provincialisms which clung to him throughout his life. Himself a man of restless energy—his list of engagements in the months preceding his illness would astonish most young ministers—he was apt to disregard the slow and careful methods by which business is usually safeguarded. The large body of work he accomplished was done in spite of such difficulties; and it is certain that those who knew him best were most attracted towards him. He was a warm-hearted and generous helper, and was as ready to do a good turn for a distressed opponent as for one of his own party. He was the cheeriest and most sociable of traveling companions, with a fund of merry anecdote and quaint reminiscence. Children and strangers felt the charm of his happy-looking face, and many a visitor from other lands, and other races, cherishes grateful recollections of his genial hospitality. To those who were privileged to know his home-life and his simple manly piety, in scenes remote from the strife and vexations of public life, the name of Robert Spears calls up tender feelings little to be guessed by those who only knew him as "ever a fighter."

The funeral service was held on Wednesday, in the Highgate Unitarian Christian Church at half-past twelve, and afterwards at Nunhead Cemetery at three o'clock. The service in the church was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford, assisted by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, W. G. Tarrant, and A. F. Riley (minister of the Highgate Baptist Church). At the grave the Rev. Alexander Gordon officiated.

There was a large attendance at the church, among those present there, or at the cemetery, or both, being, in addition to the officiating ministers, the Revs. F. Allen, W. G. Cadman, G. Carter, T. E. M. Edwards, A. Farquharson, S. Farrington, J. Harwood, J. Hocart (of Brussels), A. J. Marchant, H. W. Perris, W. C. Pope, J. Ramsay (of the Highgate Presbyterian Church), J. E. Stronge, G. St. Clair, F. Summers, J. Toye, W. Wooding, and V. D. Davis; Mr. Promotho Ioll Sen (of the Brahmo Somaj), Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss Emily Sharpe, Miss E. W. Burkitt, Messrs. F. Nettlefold, S. S. Tayler, S. W. Preston, G. L. Bristow, Ion Pritchard, John Harrison, Howard Young, and Harold Clennell.

In the course of his address at the church, Dr. Herford described Mr. Spears' vigorous personality and manifold activities, and concluded with the following verses, which some years ago had been written in a friend's book by Mr. Spears:—

MR. WISH.

That while I live, or when I die,
To know my happiness was no one's misery,
That no one's loss did ever swell my gain,
My pleasure never came from other's pain,
My joy was never sorrow to another,
That all should feel I ever was a brother—
So brotherly that it was sure to spoil
My rest to feel it came from others' toil—
Or that my strength was weakness to a neighbour's frame,
My honour purchased by another's shame;
Or that my home, or church, or land was blest
By what had other hearts and homes depressed.
My wish is this—to only hear the call,
To bless the hand, the Hand that gives to all.

MR. WILLIAM ROBERTS.

We regret to record the sudden death on Saturday, Feb. 18, of Mr. William Roberts, of Manchester, at the age of seventy-six. He was by profession an architect and surveyor; and every one in Manchester, who during the last fifty years has had any considerable dealings in real property must, at some time or other, have come into contact with him, and been impressed by the cheeriness of his temper and the soundness of his judgment. On leaving school, he was articled to Mr. William Mills, and when he began to practise on his own account, he soon gathered round him a large number of clients who had great confidence in him, not only because of his professional knowledge and skill, but also because of the uprightness and integrity which characterised the whole of his business life. He was of that type which needs no written contracts; when he made a promise it was a sacred thing to him. His father was a member of Cross-street Chapel in the old days; and he inherited his father's views both in religion and politics. For the greater part of his life, owing to residence, he does not seem to have been attached to any Unitarian place of worship, though during his latter years he was a most interested member of Moss-side Unitarian Free Church. Mr. Roberts was never married. He was of an affectionate and charitable disposition; but he objected to publicity, and had an intense dislike to his name appearing on subscription lists. The end came to him as he had wished, suddenly and without pain. He was buried in the family vault at Harpurhey Cemetery, in the presence of a goodly number of friends, the service being conducted by his friend and pastor, the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A.

In his sermon at Moss-side last Sunday morning, Mr. Roper, in the course of a warm tribute to the memory of Mr. Roberts, said:—"He has always struck me as having a clear sense of duty, and a deep anxiety to discharge his obligations honourably. He was a man of few professions and of no ostentation, and yet beneath all there was a firm faith in God and immortality, and a staunch integrity that never wavered. His thoughts were pure, his tastes elevated, and the activities of business life were a keen enjoyment to him. His friendly conversation was never marred by unkind criticism or backbiting; and he was a man who although not caring to make many mere society acquaintances, yet grappled those friends he had, and had tried, to his soul 'with hooks of steel.' No one could know him long without recognising his reverence for old times and old friendships. There was a great depth of feeling in the old man's heart. He loved to do good by stealth, and blushed if by chance his generosity came to light. The £4,000 he had promised towards our new church was conditioned by my keeping his name strictly anonymous. Now, having been true to his ideals, having been an exceedingly faithful friend, having worked hard in the earthly vineyard through a long period of years, having tried to do his duty to the fatherless and the widow, with a modesty and humility that were exceptional, in answer to the irrevocable summons, he has passed through the portal of death, to solve those mysteries of God's greater and higher Kingdom, which mortal men strive in vain to know. In his public benefactions he seems to have overlooked no institution that appealed to his sympathy; and in his private legacies he seems to have forgotten no one who had any claim upon his friendship and affectionate thought. We, his fellow-members of this church, would fain have kept him with us for a while longer, for the sake of his fellowship and friendship; but we are proud of having been associated with such a man, and of knowing that his public spirit, his benevolence and his uprightness are the natural outcome of that religious faith he held, which, in all its simplicity and beauty, teaches the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. His exceptional munificence towards this church, if it relieves us of pecuniary anxiety, at the same time involves us in a great responsibility. His gift has placed upon us grave obligations as well as affording us welcome opportunity. It increases our power for good tremendously. We are now stewards of ten talents instead of five, and a proportionate increment will be expected of us. Let us determine to be faithful to our stewardship; let us cultivate in ourselves and our children that spirit of uprightness and integrity and faithfulness which were the strong characteristics of our departed friend; and let us more strenuously and devotedly than ever before seek to spread abroad that Unitarian gospel of sweetness and light which was at the very heart of our friend's life and work."

The public benefactions of Mr. Roberts, which amount to nearly £24,000, include £4,500 to erect a bronze statue in Manchester to the memory of Mr. Gladstone, for whom he had the highest admiration and reverence; £4,000 towards the re-erection of a church for the Moss-side congregation; £1,000 to the Unitarian Home Missionary College; £1,000 to the Welsh Theological College, Bala; £1,000 to University College, Aberystwith; £2,000 to the Hulme Grammar School, Alexandra Park; £1,200 for a Life-boat, to be called the William Roberts, for the Welsh coast; also a large number of benefactions to medical charities, including £1,050 to the Manchester Royal Infirmary.

SMALL service is true service while it lasts:
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one:
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun.—Wordsworth.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Christ the Revealer," by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom.

By Religion, I fear, is now practically understood something that men are bound to believe, or something they are bound to do, or some principles that ought to regulate and control their conduct—that is, something impersonal whether of truth or of obligation—and not simply a living condition of soul, sympathy, and fellowship, that binds them into the life of God, and through the flowings of personal intercourse makes them partakers of His fulness. As long as we contemplate Truth only as a system of Doctrine, or Duty only as a system of Laws and Principles, we are in communication only with what is impersonal and formal, which may have no power at all to recommend itself to our affections, or to kindle vital energy in us; but if through the life of Prayer we are in communication with the spirit of our Father, who is ever gently striving to reveal Himself to us, then we are not dealing with any final or outward measures of Truth and Duty, but with their ever-living Source, and light from the Fount of Light is entering into us as we are able to bear it.

Of course this representation of Religion proceeds upon the assumed fact, as the finding of our experience, that God does give promptings and communications from Himself to the soul and conscience that are daily turned to Him, waiting to receive—communications not in the forms of intellectual Truth, but in new quickenings of the spirit, in the sense of a life stirring in us that is not our own, in the consciousness of a Goodness and a Holiness moving us forwards and never suffering us to stay and rest content with what we are, as though our nature could ever be a measure for itself—and in the consequent convictions of deep peace, that we are not our own, nor in our own keeping, but if we will believe it, the children of a Spirit from whom comes all that we have and are, whose Light we are receiving, whose Promptings we are obeying, whose Promises we are trusting, whose Love we are feeling, and who, as the underlying Spring of whatever stirs or emanates in us, is alone the measure or the limit of our being and our growth.

* * * * *

A religious man, of Christ's order, is not one who believes in certain doctrines about God and desires to live in conformity with those doctrines: he is one who is in personal communion with God Himself—whose spirit looks to the Holy Spirit for light and love and peace by the direct action of soul on soul—whose faith rests ultimately upon no outward evidences of Divine Goodness—and can be shaken by no conflicting appearances—upon no doubtful reasonings, and upon no uncertain philosophy, but upon the experiences of a living and inward action of God's Spirit as a fact of consciousness. Religion is not the knowledge, or the study, or the practice, of impersonal Truth: it is to be in direct and living fellowship with a personal God. The first may belong to a very lofty state of the moral character; the other alone is the attitude of a child in filial relations with the Author and Feeder of his nature.

* * * * *

communes with the living God. A Church is a fellowship of such men—the fellowship with one another of those, each of whom is in fellowship with the Holy Spirit. And the Church of the living God is the collection of all souls throughout the universe who consciously draw, or desire to draw, their spiritual life from Him—to each of whom by personal communion God is a living God.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits."—Psalm lxxviii. 19.

"O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good."—Psalm cvii. 1.

THESE sentences are good to learn by heart, and to remember. We are not apt to give thanks enough. We teach little children from the time they are babies to give thanks, and if a child snatches what he wants and runs off with it without thanks, we think what a pity that he has not been taught to give thanks. But when we get older we are apt to do like that child: we grumble and complain if we do not get what we want; and if we do get it, we are in such a hurry to enjoy it that we seldom stop to give one glance and thought of gratitude to God, from whom come all our joys and blessings.

Have you read, in Luke's Gospel (chap. xvii.) the story of ten men who had the dreadful disease of leprosy? It was such a terrible disease, and so easily given to other people, that by the Jewish law all lepers were kept apart, and were not allowed to come near others; and if they went along the public roads they had to cry out as they went that they were lepers, that every one might avoid them. The story says that when Jesus passed they cried to him, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us," and he told them to go and show themselves to the priests, which was what the law required them to do before they could go amongst other people, if they were cured. And the story tells that as they went they felt themselves cured; and one of the ten, a Samaritan, turned back and fell down at Jesus' feet, giving him thanks, and "with a loud voice glorified God." And Jesus said: "Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine? There are not found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger" (for the Jews disliked and despised the Samaritans, and considered them "strangers").

I am afraid that not more than one in ten of us returns to give thanks. Sometimes we say "I have not much to be thankful for: if I had the things that I want, I should be thankful." Have you noticed children with their toys? The child that has all sorts of beautiful toys usually picks out some one of them to be his favourite, and cares little for the rest: this one is his darling, and he carries it about with him everywhere. Another little child is poor, and has, perhaps, no toy but an old battered doll, or a dog or lamb that was once woolly and is so no longer; but this he loves with all his heart, and takes to bed with him, and never parts from. It is not a quantity of things that are needed to make us thankful.

A poor washerwoman had a little sick boy, who was in bed day and night: a poor needlewoman who lived across the court saw at night the shadow on the blind of his little arm waving to and fro, and she watched him by day too. When Valentine's Day came this poor needlewoman had saved up every penny she could spare from her small earnings, and she bought a canary in a cage for the little boy, and sent it in to him with no hint of where it came from; and then she watched from the window to see whether he liked it. Liked it? Those were no words to describe his joy. He was now the richest boy that ever lived: the whole world seemed new to him. His one treasure was everything to him—his cheerful little bird in the yellow coat, with his happy songs and his pretty ways—the dear little Peter who would take seeds from his master's lips. Frankie's heart leaped with delight. Did not his very heart "give thanks"? But some poor children have not even a bird; not one dear Peter to be their delight. Are there no joys for even the poorest—nothing for even them to give thanks for? That would be poverty indeed.

One evening, in a very poor, close, dirty street, some ragged, dirty little children were playing very roughly and noisily amongst the rubbish and dirt. One little fellow, all in rags, with hardly any boots on, had a piece of cabbage stalk which served for a ball, and he was throwing it up as high as he could; but after one very high throw he let the cabbage stalk fall to the ground, and all at once his dingy little face brightened, and as he stood still, looking up, he shouted (pointing up among the chimneys): "O, look! look!" I stopped to look, and saw a splendid bright star in the clear evening sky. The children ran to look, saying: "What is it?" "O, only a star," said one, contemptuously. "It's the evening star," said the first little boy. "No it isn't." "Yes it is." "No it isn't." "It is, I say," began to pass to and fro: so I said, "Yes it is," too, and they stood silent. I began to talk to the little boy about it, and the rest ran away; but he stood still, his cabbage stalk forgotten at his feet—still gazing at his beautiful star. His face was joyful—and, poor as he was, he had his joy, for which he was, in his own way, thankful.

The very puddles in that dingy street gave me a lesson, for they were very dirty, but the bright glowing sky and the beautiful star were reflected in them, and made a parable which reminded me how even a sad and soiled lot may be filled with the pure beauty of heaven and reflect the light of God.

It makes one glad to think that there may be joys, for which their hearts are grateful, even amongst people who seem to us to have nothing to make them happy. Can we not help to bring happiness to those who are so much less rich in blessings than we are? And let us not forget to have a grateful spirit for all our blessings.

Thou who hast given so much to me,
Give one thing more—a grateful heart.

A poor weaver who lived in a garrett and could not go to the country or see green fields and flowers and trees used to repeat this little verse:—

I will have hopes that cannot fade,
For flowers the valley yields:
I will have humble thoughts, instead
Of verdant flowery fields;
My spirit and my God shall be
My seaward hill, my boundless sea.

THE FUTURE OF OUR CHURCHES.

A REFERENCE to Unitarians in a recent article in the Spectator on "Wholesale Conversion" has naturally attracted the amused attention of the people who for the thousandth time are gravely told in public that as a religious body they are "rapidly dying away." It is a stale reply to say that if such is really the case they are "an unconscionable time a-dying," and in last week's Spectator Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, in a letter from which we quote more fully in another column, mentioned that fifty years ago he was dissuaded by orthodox friends for that very reason from entering the Unitarian ministry. We have never been a large body, either in our "Unitarian" or pre-Unitarian days, and in this country apparently have little genius for ecclesiastical extension; but when it is remembered what our people have done in this generation for Manchester College at Oxford, for the two Sustentation Funds, and for new churches added to our religious connection, we may, with a quiet mind, leave it to the pessimists and to interested observers who would much prefer that we should die, to believe such prognostications of our impending fate.

Among those ill-favoured friends, who would eagerly crowd about our death-bed, we do not include the writer of the Spectator article. The reference to Unitarians was only incidental, in illustration of an argument, and the statement as to our "rapidly dying away" was probably made without any very serious consideration. People have said it, and it gets repeated. But that is their concern, not ours. The Spectator was giving reasons why we do not now hear of the wholesale conversion of any nation or considerable body of people to a new form of religious faith:—

Men with new convictions feel less impelled than of old to obey them in visible action. There has been a gradual but widespread change in the general conception of the character of the Almighty, the laity have ceased to believe that they will be tortured for honest errors of belief, and they are, therefore, gravely tempted, even when the inner faith has changed, to remain in the Church they were born in, which is endeared to them by habit and by the force of many earthly ties, and which, as they conceive, will do almost as well as any other. The sense of a necessity for correlating faith with action has grown decidedly weaker. There are, for example, thousands of Unitarians within the English Establishment, yet the Unitarian Church as a body of avowed believers in the humanity of Christ is rapidly dying away. Why, they think, should they quit the religion they were born in when they can think their own thoughts, and will in no way be arraigned of heaven for worshipping the true God within the house of Rimmon? They are probably wrong morally, but their consciences are quiescent.

Now as to this argument, we do not propose to follow it up any further. We have no doubt whatever that there are thousands of Unitarians connected with the Church of England, and other thousands in communion with the great Nonconformist bodies of this country. They are not to be set down in any one category, as faithful or unfaithful to their light, for there are many reasons, some worthy, some unworthy, that induce such people to remain where they are, rather than seek a new religious connection in which the doctrinal teaching would more accord with their own actual belief. What we desire is to take the occasion of this public reference to our body, to set out a little more clearly, if we can, how the future appears to us, and what is the ideal of religious service set before our churches.

What is popularly known as "the Unitarian body" in this country is a religious community gathered into a little group of churches, various in their origin, but a good number of them going back in the unbroken history of their religious fellowship and worship to the early days of Protestant Dissent, before there was any thought among them of what is known as Unitarianism. Their foundation principle is not any orthodoxy, either Trinitarian or Unitarian, but spiritual Freedom. They are in matters of doctrine Non-subscribing churches, dedicated simply to the worship of God. That is the ideal of our religious fellowship, which we inherit from the fathers who, in the first days of toleration, built the old chapels and held them on open trusts. It is the ideal to which we desire all who join our fellowship, and all new churches which may grow up in our connection, to be true.

The central fact is, therefore, the worship of God, and the nurture of religious life which that implies. That is the great purpose for which the churches are founded, and whatever in the open future may become of our Unitarianism, which is to us now vital truth, the mission of our group of Free Churches will remain. Still they will be called to be upholders of spiritual freedom, dedicated to God alone, loyal to the guidance of His truth; still they will have their own share of religious work to do, for the well-being of this nation and the world; still their supreme function will be to nourish the deeper life of the soul, and to minister to all religious needs.

Our churches may have to remain isolated for many years yet to come, as they are now, through continuing theological divisions, or they may be merged in some larger ecclesiastical fellowship with others who will enter into the inheritance of spiritual freedom. That is a matter which must be left for the future to decide. But the instant call of duty is to religious work and worship, and that must remain always, for our churches as for others, the first claim.

What, therefore, the thousands of Unitarians who remain in the Church of England or elsewhere may be doing is a matter of secondary interest to us as compared with the question what we ourselves are doing with our religious opportunities.

For those of us who have accepted the trust of our Free Churches there is no ground for discouragement or fear, but every reason for a more strenuous and joyful pressing forward into the future. For our calling is to forget ourselves in the service of the world, to be utterly surrendered to God, whose holy purpose is to be effected in that service of the world. For this great service all the churches of the land are needed, and more than all, and ours as much as any.

Whether our members are few or many we have the quiet place of prayer to maintain, the home of spiritual faith, the centre of quickening energy for unselfish service in the world. The careless or unfriendly critic may tell us that as a religious people we are dying out, because many who might unite with us do not, and we may be painfully aware of much that is lacking in ourselves, and yet that life of humble and trustful surrender to God, and of hunger after righteousness, does not die: there is always the open future to be entered with new hope and joy, to be filled with a more faithful and more fruitful service.

Those of us who are Unitarians must bear an unmistakable witness to the truth as it is made clear to us; it is part of the testimony of our churches to this generation; but the emphasis must be not on controversial theology, but on living religion. We declare our Unitarianism because this is our open way of access to the living God, the way of prayer, our only saving faith.

Yet it must be manifested not in argument, but in spiritual power, if it is to feed the world's hunger and to justify the maintenance of our churches. So we have to declare our discipleship to the human CHRIST, and to demonstrate in our religious communion and in our share of the world's work, what JESUS really meant, what the power of his spirit is, how it makes for brotherhood, and leads men to the FATHER.

While Unitarians of the Dispersion follow the course which seems to them best or easiest, we have to show that we who are Unitarians gathered into Free Churches in our loyalty to truth can maintain an effectual religious fellowship, and do our part in ministering to the religious needs of men. There is need, in our view more need than ever, in the present condition of religious life in this country, for the testimony of our churches, and for such homes of spiritual freedom as they can provide. And we do not believe that the faithful men and women of our communion will suffer this great opportunity to be lost.

CHRIST AND COMMON PEOPLE.

II.—THE GOOD NEWS OF GOD.

HAVE we a gospel for the common people? Do the common people hear us gladly? Do we so present our new teaching and all the "news" of modern and advanced religious thought in such clear and inspiring form, that our news of God is hailed by the common people as good news? Does a deeper stirring of the common people to religious enthusiasm and truth follow everywhere the founding of our churches? Is it pre-eminently a movement among the common people? If not, are we, or can we be, in any true sense, the followers of Christ?

Is not the one essential in a disciple of Christ that he should follow the example and labour in the spirit of Christ? And was not the one labour of Christ the labour of explaining the Gospel to common people? He laboured to explain. His explanations are his message. Some explanation that could be understood of common people he laboured to think out and to set before them. The newness of his teaching was not that the truths he taught were new, but that he taught these truths to a new class of people. A class of people who had not had the truths of religion explained to them before, and who were commonly judged incapable of appreciating spiritual meanings—the common people—found in Jesus a teacher, who was determined to try and teach them.

Christ taught the common people. He taught them the weight of spiritual meanings, and the intensity of spiritual wants and satisfactions. He taught them the spiritual weights and measures, the quantities and qualities of the spiritual life, and how to calculate values by reference to the spiritual balance. Wrapped in the outward form of a picture story or a parable, he conveyed to them, or drew forth from them, the right expressions of spiritual emotion and the graduated measures in the scales of approval and disapproval. With easy examples he educated the soul in spiritual self-expression and trained it to ultimate reliance on the expression of all life quantities in spiritual terms.

The soul became recognised as the one common measure of all things, and the spiritual result as the result of life. To God, whom all men in common do secretly know, every man knows he must give an account of his life: and on this balance-sheet, the gain of the whole world is reversed and counts only for loss, if the spirit be dissatisfied with the soul.

These and many like spiritual truths—recognised in all ages by the men of genius, of special inspiration, of learning, and of philosophy; but hitherto unrecognised or, at least, unexplained to the common run of men—Jesus by parable, by catechism, by vivid illustration and example, made clear to common people. If he could not make them follow out a logically constructed intellectual theory, and could give them no new system of synthetic philosophy, he, nevertheless, out of his parables and examples drew forth the spiritual essential. He made the hearts of the people respond to the spirit of God. He extracted from the common ore of human life the true divine metal which gives to every character its true weight and value: and what had hitherto been regarded as the bottomless pits of human degradation began to glisten, struck by his striking ideas and opened out by his love, with the purest pronouncements of the spirit, and the clearest revelations of immanent divinity. Thus Christ produced the continual witness of God's presence in the midst of his hearers, revealed the Kingdom already within that he declared would be found within, and brought to light in his hearers the evidence of his sayings. He revealed the essential divinity, hitherto latent and unrecognised, in common and even the very commonest humanity.

Now wherein, if it be not in this, lies the gospel, the good news, which Christ proclaimed? Can any man, who is not able to make manifest this same divinity in common lives, proclaim the same good news? Can he point, as Christ, to the same witness of God's presence? If the common people make no response to his appeal, can he have the same witness that Christ had, the same demonstration of God's spirit and presence in the midst of the people? Surely not. If the common people are an ore, which our love glows not hot enough to melt, and if their latent divinity escapes all our efforts to extract it, we fail to produce the evidence which Christ produced, and the good news of his success passes severe judgment on our failure. For Christ showed that the spirit of God was present in common people, and if we are not able to show this, must we not speak of our failure as bad, not good, news? And proclaim sadly that, so far as we can see, the elements of divinity are not to be found in common people, and the Kingdom of God does not seem to be within them?

Surely it is vain to repeat the saying, if we cannot repeat the saving. If the common people are not being saved by our efforts, how shall we announce that they are? How placard our churches with "good news of men's salvation," when we have no such news to tell? Where has the gospel, or good news, to come from? Surely from deeds done: it must be news of facts, not fancies.

So then if, as a matter of fact, the common people are not stirred by us to make manifest their religious nature, how shall we be able to teach or to believe that they have a religious nature? Must we not half believe that God is present only in the learned and the cultured, and that His presence in common folk is doubtful? Is not the whole gospel taken from us?

If the common people escape us, God has escaped us just where God did not escape Jesus, and the one gospel which Jesus had becomes the one gospel that we have not—namely, the good news of the discovery of God's presence in the hearts of common people, and of the response of common people to the high appeals of a spiritual religion.

The good news of Christ, that in speaking of God, of Love, of Prayer, of Self-sacrifice, of the Cross, of Faith, of Hope, of Charity, of Life and Death and Immortality, and spiritually of a spiritual religion, he had the hearts of the common people with him, and found his most earnest followers among the common people, and made the common people understand and follow him—is not the good news, and never can be, of any Church which has no such good news to tell.

In any such Church the common people must find a bad spell and not a good one. Not that such a Church need differ from Christ in theological doctrine, it is sufficient difference if it lack his human sympathies. It may have all knowledge and all faith, and all spirituality and spiritual gifts as he had, save only that it lacks his love—his love for common people.

It may value, even more than he did, the accurate intellectual phrasing of faith by gifted minds, and the correct expression of theological theory; but if it values somewhat less than he did the real presence of God, though latent, in common lives and is less laborious to call forth the reality, than to express the theory of Divinity in the midst of the people, it does not follow in the steps of Christ. Surely we follow the philosophers when we explain our faith to those who can understand it. We follow the Scribes when we gather up our skirts and keep clean our favourite texts far from the mud of common and unclean lives. We follow the blind Pharisees when we despise the common people for their dulness, their sin, and their ignorance. We follow Christ's enemies when we merely take up stones to cast at the evildoers, and throw headlong over the precipice the human sympathy of Christ. Is this the way to follow Christ? Shall not Christ vanish? Shall he not pass unseen through the midst of the crowd and escape us? Shall not Christ and his gospel of God escape us, just where Jesus found God's gospel—in the hearts of common people? WILFRED HARRIS.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co. THE IRISH UNIVERSITY QUESTION.

SIR,—Mr. Street's three letters to THE INQUIRER on this subject must have come as a disappointment to those who welcomed your editorial notice of Mr. Balfour's letter, setting forth his proposals for giving satisfaction to Roman Catholic feeling in Ireland.

Mr. Street brings out very clearly the difficulties that beset English Nonconformists who attempt to solve Irish problems. There is always some unfortunate principle, dear to the Nonconformist heart, that lies like a lion in the path, and threatens an impasse. Mr. Street, no doubt, represents the views of many Nonconformists, but I should be sorry, if amongst us, his conclusions were generally accepted. If the confined and narrow view of our duty to Ireland put forward by Mr. Street is to prevail, there is small hope of settling this thorny question or doing anything else to heal the wounds that still kept Great Britain and Ireland apart. On the other hand, the courageous and sympathetic attitude taken up by Mr. Balfour seems to afford some hope that a better state of affairs may come to pass. Our body, of all others, has least justification for narrowness or religious prejudice, and I consider that Mr. Balfour ought to have our support, for what it is worth, in the effort he is making to educate his party up to "this measure of justice to the Roman Catholics of Ireland," as you most properly term it.

Mr. Street, in the opening sentences of his first letter, characterises Mr. Balfour's proposals as "reactionary," but one has to look far on in his letter to ascertain the grounds on which he does so. He says Mr. Balfour's voice is that of the siren luring us to destruction; also that madness lies that way. Mr. Street's argument then goes forward by stages; his first position, gained with some difficulty, is that Mr. Balfour's scheme is, in principle, one of concurrent endowment. His next step is that concurrent endowment, in some way, offends the moral sentiment of Englishmen, and is opposed to principles which a British Parliament believe to be sound and true. From this he goes forward to the proposition that, so long as Ireland is ruled, in its national affairs, by a British Parliament nothing must be yielded her that is inconsistent with British principles and convictions, and finally reaches the conclusion that the British Parliament is in duty bound to turn a deaf ear to Mr. Balfour's proposals, whatever the consequences to Ireland may be.

It is surely a mistake to set up, as Mr. Street appears to do, rigid principles that are neither generally accepted or acted upon, even in England, and then expect to force them on Ireland, where they are certainly alien to the instincts of the people. Mr. Street admits that if Ireland had Home Rule she would probably, as a first step, establish a University that would satisfy Roman Catholic feeling; and further, that for this she could hardly be blamed, and yet he sternly says no.

On the other hand, Mr. Balfour's proposals seem an honest attempt to do for Ireland what she would like to do for herself; surely we ought to look with a kindly eye on them, and, in considering them, give the first place to Ireland's wants and wishes, rather than devote ourselves to erecting English obstacles to block the way.

B. DOWSON.

Nottingham, Feb. 27.

SIR,—Of writing many letters on this subject there is no end. On both sides and on all sides the leaders and the formers of public opinion have had much to say. It is not too early, perhaps, to try to gather up results.

1. No one whose opinion is worth taking is content with the present condition of University education in Ulster. That is a matter about which all real educationists are agreed. It is no new thing either. Year after year, in his annual report, the President of Queen's College, Belfast, has renewed his protest against the meagre conditions to which University teaching here has been reduced—conditions "unsatisfactory in the extreme." And in this present controversy one of the documents which will need to be taken into account presents a series of resolutions, passed unanimously at a special meeting of the Faculty of Queen's College, again declaring the present provision for University education in Ireland unsatisfactory, and asserting:—"That in our opinion the higher education of the North of Ireland would be admirably served by the re-establishment of the old Queen's University on its former broad non-sectarian basis . . . with its seat in Belfast, and with the provision of an adequate endowment." Ulster, in fact, needs and is asking for an efficient teaching University.

2. No one whose opinion is worth counting wants a "Presbyterian" University. For my own part, I am inclined to believe that that phrase has been introduced into the discussion almost inadvertently. As the President of Queen's College, Dr. Hamilton, wrote, the other day:—"There is no such proposal before the public at all." What we are all thinking of here is a University which shall be on the same free lines as Queen's College itself. "On the staff of this college," said Dr. Hamilton in 1897, "all the prevailing denominations are represented—Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Unitarian, Methodist, and Moravian—and to say that perfect harmony prevails among the professors is to understate the truth. The difference in creed makes no difference whatever in friendship or collaboration. . . . It is the great glory of this college that it stands on this broad foundation. . . . Of that great glory I, for one, hope it will never be deprived." And again, only the other day, "Any movement [to sectarianise the college] would have my most uncompromising opposition."

3. There is no chance whatever of introducing into Trinity College, Dublin, such changes as would meet the needs of the North. It would be well, once for all, to put that notion aside. T. C. D. would not have it on any terms whatever. You might as well call upon Oxford to receive Manchester College as one of its constituent colleges. Gladstone was wrecked on that rock in 1873. And as for our Catholic youth, it is quite true that, of its own free grace, Trinity welcomes all comers now to its classes and its honours; but it is also true that, by Queen Elizabeth's foundation charter, the College exists to counteract "Poperie and other ill qualities." And that is not what the North wants. Better let Trinity College alone.

4. The Irish educational principle of "united secular and separate religious instruction" has wholly failed to establish peace and amity among the young people of differing Churches. No one regrets the failure more than I do. It means for me the giving up of a long-cherished thought. With Professor Dill, "I feel a profound regret—that the hope of uniting young Irishmen of all creeds in the pursuit of a common culture is to be forever abandoned." But it is needful to face facts, and this is one of them. "The system has failed," says Judge O'Connor Morris in his last book; "separate religious instruction does not flourish in the schools, and the schools have not reconciled in the slightest degree the young of the still divided faiths of Ireland." Question may well arise, therefore, as to the value, after all, of an educational principle which seems to mean nothing better than an unwilling truce.

5. In higher education, at least, the principle has already broken down, to make way for the rival principle of concurrent endowment. It ought to be known that the so-called Catholic University in Dublin is already subsidised by Government. In the present controversy, and in view of future changes, this is surely a very interesting and very important matter. Here is what Dr. Hamilton has written about it:—"The supreme governing body consists of the Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland; and this Catholic University, with its constituent colleges, enjoys annually an income from funds provided by Parliament, as nearly as possible equal to that given to Queen's College, Belfast. I think the time has come for making this fact public." In a later letter, Dr. Hamilton repeats his assertion of the fact he had disclosed; he "does not wonder at the astonishment with which it was received"; and he explains: the annual subsidy is conveyed to the Catholic University "by a secret method devised by Lord Beaconsfield, and mainly carried through Parliament by him and his Chancellor, Lord Cairns." And this has been going on for "twenty years." Is the principle already surrendered, then? Is it a question now of more or less money merely?

Sir, my purpose in troubling you with this letter is not to seek opportunity in your columns for setting forth my own opinion on the whole question which is coming up for settlement among us. I have an opinion of my own about what should be done, and I am neither ashamed of it nor afraid to declare it. But I have written with purpose to call attention to facts which lie at the very heart of the matter and which are in some danger, I think, of being overlooked or misunderstood. But I may venture the hope that the question will not be laid aside by us until we can claim to stand wholly clear of reproach for either inconsistency, or theological churlishness, or stinginess toward the best interests of youth.

DOUGLAS WALMSLEY.

Belfast, March 1.

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH AND MISSION, BETHNAL-GREEN.

THE annual meeting was held in the Mansford-street Church on Wednesday evening, preceded by tea and coffee, and a social meeting of members and friends. The chair was taken by the Rev. HENRY GOW, of Leicester, the first minister of the church and mission, on its establishment ten years ago. There were also present the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford, S. Farrington, W. G. Cadman, and V. D. Davis, Mr. Stanton W. Preston (secretary), and Miss Preston, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Squire, Mr. and Mrs. F. S. Garratt, Miss Norton, Messrs. H. Baily, H. B. Lee, W. Clark, J. G. Foster, Alfred Thompson, and many others.

Mr. STANTON W. PRESTON read the Committee's report and also the statement of accounts, in the absence of Mr. J. R. Holland, the treasurer.

The Committee referred with satisfaction to the detailed reports of Mr. Cadman and of the congregation, showing that the work was steadily advancing. The gathering in of young people, and especially young men, was noted as a cheering sign, and also the great advance in the Provident Fund, which collected £509 18s. 6d., the largest amount produced by any year's work. If more ladies would devote themselves to this Monday morning's work the amount could be indefinitely increased; and for other departments of the work more helpers were needed. Considerable expenses had been incurred in outside painting and repairs, and but for a donation of £20 from Miss E. J. Garrett, and £50 taken from Mrs. Sadler's legacy, the deficiency in the accounts would have been far greater than it was. The Committee spoke in the highest terms of the devotion of Mr. Cadman to the work and of the help he received from Mrs. Cadman.

The accounts showed £257 5s. received in subscriptions, £47 8s. 8d. from a collection at Rosslyn hill Chapel, £40 from the London District Unitarian Society, £20 from the B. and F.U.A. The expenses, including an adverse balance of £14 19s. 2d., amounted to £447 6s. 8d., which, reckoning the donations above-mentioned, left a deficiency of £18 13s. The Committee urged the necessity for a considerable increase of annual subscriptions, pointing to the reports as evidence of the great value of the work, and of the care with which all the means intrusted to them were used.

The Chapel Committee's report was read by Mr. W. J. CLARKE, the Chapel balance-sheet by Mr. J. G. FOSTER, showing an encouraging increase in the congregation's contributions, and the minister's report by the Rev. W. G. CADMAN.

The minister's report spoke of the great service rendered by Mr. Stanton Preston as chairman of the Chapel Committee and of the congregation, and appealed for a volunteer to take the place of Mr. J. W. Brown, the afternoon superintendent of the Sunday-school, who had removed from the district. Grateful acknowledgment of Mr. Brown's devoted services was made. Great advantage had been derived from close connection with the local branch of the Charity Organisation Society. The work of the Provident Society was steadily increasing. The Convalescent Fund had sent forty-six persons, old and young, to the Hampstead rooms, thirty-three teachers and elder scholars to Bexhill-on-Sea, and fourteen persons (six being children) to various convalescent homes and health resorts. Thirty-eight scholars had been sent away by the Children's Holiday Fund (Essex Hall).

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports, said that so many memories thronged upon him as he stood there face to face with old friends, that he felt it difficult to make a speech of any set kind; but there was one thought which must be expressed at that meeting. That church and mission had grown out of two former centres of work in the East-end, the Spicer-street Mission and that at Cambridge-row. The latter had been founded through the initiative of the Rev. Robert Spears, of whose death they had heard with deep regret. No man had been more self-sacrificing, in the way of sending out some of his best workers from his own centre, encouraging them to work in new districts on their own responsibility, and sustaining them in the work. In his great earnestness to spread the truth as he understood it, he inspired his workers, and so had established various centres in the East-end of London, which had done good and noble work. From his own experience as formerly working under Mr. Spears at Cambridge-row, the Chairman bore testimony to the strength of his convictions and his great earnestness, while at the same time there never was a kinder man, nor more generous in encouraging and leaving liberty of action to those who worked with him.

In that church and mission they had a grand opportunity for noble and useful work. It was usual to draw a certain distinction between a minister and a missionary, but the best work was done when the two were one. The minister supplied a demand. Sunday by Sunday he ministered to people who had religious needs, who came prepared and responsive to his teaching. The missionary, if he might put it so, demanded a supply. He went to those who had no sense of need, no desire for spiritual worship. Outside his church the missionary was engaged in trying to awaken those that slept. It was a pity when the two were divided, and they never were entirely so, but there they were completely one. The minister and the workers of the Mission could go outside and come into contact with the great rough world of men and women. One of the great dangers of a Unitarian minister was, that he had such delightful relations with his own people it was difficult to get outside and see life just as a common man. But the missionary was bound to go outside, not as a Unitarian, not as any kind of "arian"—not to spread a particular kind of doctrine, but to awaken the soul, to awaken the need of God, to give men a sense of higher inner life. Nowhere was there less response to preaching than in the East-end of London. The habit of not attending public worship was more widely spread there than in most places. And they must not look forward to a crowded congregation for many years. But there was no place where the response to the man was better, where people were more willing to recognise kind intentions, less inclined to stand on their dignity, more willing to share their own experiences with a man who came to them in a human, sympathetic way. And, after all, that was the great necessity of their time, not the gathering of crowds to hear sermons, and to swear allegiance to a particular form of faith, but the awakening of men and women to higher life, higher ideals, which could be done far more effectually by personal relations than from the pulpit. That was the strange and terrible phenomenon of their time, that men both rich and poor lived for such low sordid ends, and the aim of the Mission was to appeal to such, not only carrying charity to the very wretched, but to do something for those who were comparatively comfortable, to awaken in them a sense of the divine. Everyone who listened to Mr. Cadman's report must have felt how modest and full of good work it was. Reading between the lines they recognised how much was being done beyond what was directly mentioned. He was specially impressed by the growth of the Provident district work. That was work which lay at the doors of anyone who might choose to take it up. It led to personal relations of an entirely simple nature between rich and poor—those who wanted to help, and those who were not aware that they were in need of any help. Of such people the East-end was full—not ten in a room, not the awful suffering and poverty of which sensational pictures were drawn in the newspapers, but the sadness and weakness that did not attract, the apathy which made people content with what they ought not to be content with. They were not to be helped by any kind of science, but only by the love in human hearts. Mr. Cadman appealed for more helpers to stand by him in that great work. It was a boundless field, and offered boundless reward to those who engaged in it. If that was realised he was convinced that more of their people would come down to help.

The Rev. S. FARRINGTON seconded the resolution, and urged all his hearers to read a remarkable book, "In His Steps," which had that day been put into his hands. It was a revelation, in the form of a striking story, of the kind of Christian life they were living, and the life they might live if they always asked themselves what Jesus would do if he were here and in their circumstances. The book made one feel how satisfied people were with what they ought not to be satisfied with, and how much they yet might do in following Christ in his sufferings. Mr. Farrington concluded with a reference to the great kindness and devotion to genuine Christian work of Mr. Spears, and the resolution was unanimously passed.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD proposed a resolution of cordial acknowledgment and heartfelt sympathy with Mr. and Mrs. Cadman in their work. They had only small gains to chronicle. There and elsewhere the work did not go forward in great bounds; it was quiet, personal work. He knew from the old days in Manchester how faithfully Mr. Cadman had prepared himself, and how faithful he was to the work. Such a church and mission did not make a great noise in the world, but the work grew through quiet personal influence. It rested not on Mr. and Mrs. Cadman alone, but on all the helpers gathered about them, and he should do all that he could to encourage others to join them.

Mr. E. B. SQUIRE seconded the resolution, and Mr. CADMAN responded, after which, on the motion of Mr. WALTER BAILY, seconded by the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, the Committee was appointed, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. S. W. PRESTON, seconded by Mr. W. J. CLARK, brought a successful and encouraging meeting to a close.

WHOEVER fears God, fears to sit at ease . . . let us be content, in work, to do the thing we can, and not presume to fret because its little.—E. B. Browning.

DOMESTIC MISSION, HURST-STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

THE fifty-ninth annual meeting of this Mission was held on Monday evening last, the 27th, the Lord Mayor, Alderman C. G. BEALE, presiding. The attendance was a very large one, the chapel being crowded, floor and gallery alike. Among the subscribers, members of the Committee, and other friends present were the Lady Mayoress, Mr. and Mrs. Howard S. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Ryland, Councillor Martineau, Messrs. E. Townley, J. D. Skirrow, D. J. O'Neill, G. Basnett, Revs. J. Wood, J. Howard, and W. J. Clarke. There was also a very large assemblage of the Mission workers.

The Report of the Committee was read by Mr. H. S. SMITH:—

The report stated that another year of useful work had been accomplished by the Mission. Not only had the high standard of former years been maintained, but the number of agencies connected with the Mission and the amount of work which had consequently to be done were still increasing to such an extent as almost to overtax the powers of so energetic and indefatigable a worker as their missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke. After referring to their religious services on Sunday and to some of the more important of the special agencies of the Mission, and intimating that the whole field of the Mission activity for the past year would be covered in Mr. Clarke's statement, the report concluded by stating that "the proud position the Mission has attained must be a source of the greatest satisfaction to all interested in its welfare," adding that this was almost entirely due to the enormous capacity for organisation and for work, and the unflagging enthusiasm of their missionary.

The Treasurer's account, also read by Mr. H. S. SMITH, showed an expenditure of £165 in excess of the income. Deducting one item of extraordinary expenditure of about £50, it will appear that the ordinary income was about £115 less than the ordinary expenditure. The Committee had at the present time the question of the finances under their serious consideration, and were making every effort to equalise income and expenditure.

In the Missionary's Report, read by Mr. W. J. CLARKE, the Mission activities for the past year were grouped under four different headings:—

Under the heading of "Religious Work" it was stated that three services were held now every Sunday:—The chapel being filled in the morning by Mr. Clarke's adult class, crowded in the afternoon at the P.S.A., and well attended again in the evening by the ordinary congregation; the aggregate number of worshippers being few short of 1,000. Mr. Clarke stated that there were no sensational accessories of any kind whatever in connection with these services, and that yet the heartiness of the singing was an inspiration in itself; while the devoutness, the reverence, the reality which characterised them were to him a source of indescribable satisfaction. Interesting particulars were also given in relation to the junior schools, special reference being made to the circumstance that the anniversary services were held at the Town Hall, which was well filled with a congregation, numbering upwards of 2,000 people. Under the heading of "Educational Work" it was stated that classes were held for Biblical study, physiography, chemistry, dress-cutting, basket-making, sewing, vocal and instrumental music, &c. All of these classes were doing good and valuable work—those for science especially so. The physiography class was probably the largest and most successful in the United Kingdom. During these last few years 61 per cent. of the students had passed the examination in connection with the Science and Art Department, as against 27 per cent. for the whole country.

The social work embraced recreation-room, cricket club and social gatherings, tea meetings, concerts, miscellaneous entertainments, Christmas and New Year parties in connection with the congregation, the teachers' society, the junior Sunday-schools, the adult class, the P.S.A., mothers' meetings, the Band of Hope, &c.

Under the heading of "Philanthropic and Co-operative Work, interesting and exhaustive particulars were given relating to the work of the following agencies:—The Ladies' Committee, the Band of Hope, the Magazine Circulation, Flower Distribution, Mothers' Meetings, Advice Bureau, Crippled Children's Union, Poor Children's Cinderellas, Poor Children's Summer Evening Parties, Poor Children's Summer Afternoon Outings, Guild of Play, Fairy Tale Class, Police-Aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, Military Veterans' Association, Courts and Alleys' Open-Air Concerts' Association, Savings' Clubs, Benevolent Fund, Sick and Dividend Club, Provident Society, &c. In connection with this important sphere of the Mission labours, it was pointed out that 12,147 visits had been paid to and received from the poor, among whom 2,285 medical notes, 2,026 garments, and 478 parcels of books had been distributed during the year; and that the amount disbursed in alms, weekly pensions, medical notes, clothing, groceries, coal, bread, and forty-two indoor and outdoor gatherings of the aged poor, crippled children, slum children, &c., had amounted to upwards of £650. In connection with the Crippled Children's Union thirty-three instruments had been supplied by means of hospital notes, and forty-five afflicted children sent to convalescent homes. Others were being taught basket-making, drawing and painting, artificial-flower making, and some who were unable to attend school the three R's. In connection with the Police-Aided Association 1,500 destitute children had been clothed during the year, and nearly £150 obtained for and disbursed among Distressed Military Veterans.

In moving the adoption of the reports the LORD MAYOR spoke in the highest terms of the work of the Mission generally, expressing his satisfaction at seeing so many hundred people present, while at many of the annual meetings he attended only members of the Committee were there. He regarded the recently formed Courts and Alleys' Open-Air Concerts' Association as one of the highest value and importance. He also expressed his appreciation of the work achieved on behalf of poor crippled children, and congratulated the Mission workers upon the great strides that had been made during the year. He attributed their success largely to the fact that they were all united in one great work which brought them together in the highest form of union that Christian workers could adopt.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD also congratulated the missionary and his helpers on the vast amount of useful and truly needed work they had done. He thought that the area over which the Mission activities extended was unparalleled.

Brief addresses were also delivered by Councillor Martineau, Messrs. D. J. O'Neill, George Basnett, J. J. Coleman, G. H. Pearce, E. Townley, J. D. Skirrow, and C. Johnson.

The meeting was generally regarded as probably the best attended, the heartiest and most encouraging yet held in the history of the Mission.

GREAT men are they who see that spiritual is stronger than material force; that thoughts rule the world.—Emerson.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EAST CHESHIRE.

I AM asked for another Provincial Letter from East Cheshire. But I fear it comes too soon after the last one.

Our local association, the East Cheshire Christian Union, has won no further laurels, nor has it abandoned any of its work. Indeed, as its treasurer, I am grateful to say it began its New Year last October with a small balance in hand. This has been effected by means of a close, almost cheese-paring economy, and the annual planning of the pattern of our coat to the size of our cloth.

The young community at Ashton, which you will remember is in the neighbouring county of Lancaster, is both living and lively—nothing led by the Rev. W. C. Hall would be allowed to sleep long—and the congregation are aspiring to possess a building of their own in which to carry on and forward chapel and Sunday-school work. The hard and devoted work which they will have to put forth before that object can be completely attained, will do much to solidify the congregation and be part of the hardening process which gives health to every cause.

Retracing our steps across the river Tame, which divides the counties here, I feel constrained to assert that Unitarianism, including Free Christianity, &c., is at a standstill in this county of Cheshire; and further, that this stationary condition is by no means recent. Many of the chapels are old foundations, and, as regards attendance, they have certainly seen their best days. Instead of chapels tolerably well filled, we now see empty and half-filled pews. And in most of the newer congregations the zeal and energy and go-aheadness, with which they were animated at their start, is dead or dying out.

This should not be: but why is it so? The bars to progress, or even to keeping the same footing, may come from inside or from outside.

I know at least two towns in Cheshire where there are Unitarian chapels which, as to commercial prosperity, have unfortunately fallen from a much higher estate and may even be now considered, alas! on the downward path. Some others are and have for long been veritable Sleepy Hollows: from these there is a constant leakage of the younger, smarter, more energetic, element. Going forward is here out of the question; it is hard, hard work to keep head above water. In such cases the devotion of both pastor and congregation to a cause they have at heart is a grand example to the more fortunate, and deserves the utmost that can be given of sympathy and help.

The case of our chapels in the larger and prospering towns is different. The numbers in attendance do not increase anything like proportionately to the increase in the population. Established churches, and Wesleyan, and Baptist, and Independent chapels spring up here and there, or require and get enlargement; but the Unitarian chapel remains as it was, a sufficiently capacious shelter for a congregation not suffering from growing pains. Rural bigotry restricts the expansion of our village congregations, but the conditions of urban life give ample elbow-room to all sects. Yet Orthodox Dissent will flourish under unfavourable conditions to which Unitarian chapels succumb.

I was in a Mid-Cheshire town a short time ago—a town which I should consider at a standstill, mourning a lost industry. There is a charming Unitarian chapel there, old and small, yet quite large enough for the requirements; the pastor is energetic, much beloved, and works hard. In the same street is a Wesleyan chapel recently enlarged, holding perhaps 800, and said to be well filled each week. Both congregations exist in the same environment, but with different results.

It would be clearly unfair to debit outside circumstances alone with our failures to get on, and we must look to the inside working of the congregations themselves for an explanation of many of the disappointing results.

I take it that a Church will maintain forward position in a community if it has a needed testimony to declare and an attractive method of declaring it. This is the secret of the success of the newest of our Church movements, that of the P.S.A.

May I, without offence, apply this canon of life to what I know of Unitarian congregations? I do not speak from experience of one chapel: I have been a member—in two cases an acting member—of six of our congregations, and have been ministered to by eight pastors, from all of whom in time of trouble I have received fatherly or brotherly help and advice.

Our denominational literature and speeches at denominational meetings set forth the necessity of Unitarianism to humanity in glowing terms—a simple message of good tidings for every one, free, without restriction, and within the comprehension of all. But the message which we hear from the pulpit is too often, at its best, a refined, well-delivered essay on some moral subject, somewhat critical, by no means easy to follow to the uncultured, and coming from the head and seeking for admission to the head, instead of from heart to heart—and at its worst, a bundle of unconnected paragraphs loosely tied round by, in place of being strung on, a text. What help for the battles in life does such preaching give us? Men and women who feel the seriousness of the moral struggles in which they are daily called to take a part—who wish to come forth with some little show of victory; who would fain rise to a nobler life; who need both armour and weapons for the fight—listen to such a message unmoved. It may be pleasant to one ear on the first day of the week, but it has passed out at the other before the second day, with its manifold labours and duties, has ended. The average Unitarian preacher does not address himself to the sinning man or woman, but to those who need no repentance. There is here no attempt to save souls.

And the manner in which this message is delivered, the framework in which it is set, is far too little attractive. The lessons from the Bible are too frequently read in a peculiar sing-song which takes all living reality out of the record, and is, I fear, responsible, to a large extent, for the idea which young folk have that the Bible is a terribly dry book. How differently some of the same ministers used in former days to read at Penny Readings!

But do we fare better inside Orthodox churches? In one respect we don't, the lesson reading is even worse than with us, sometimes almost unintelligible; in other respects we should be better off. The sermon, whatever its nominal subject may be, will almost invariably work round to an offer of salvation from sin.

For the most important of what I should venture to call denominational defects, I hold that the congregations themselves are largely responsible. With changed views about salvation is creeping in the idea that they are congregations of the just made perfect; and when a preacher launches forth against evil and wrong-doings he is accused of "preaching at us." How often young ministers' wings are thus clipped, they alone can tell. I wonder whether an appeal to the minister to ask an evil-liver to relinquish his sin could be quoted as a solitary instance.

I am afraid my letter has gone somewhat beyond its province. Yet if in our chapels the reading of lessons were more like ordinary intelligent reading, if the prayers sounded more an expression of the heart's desire, if the sermon made more direct reference to daily needs, and if the congregations would just refrain now and then from thinking themselves only a little lower than the angels, the Unitarian chapels in East Cheshire would have a better chance of drawing within their fold some of those who now attend Orthodox Dissenting chapels, P.S.A. meetings, or who go nowhere.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—On Wednesday, Feb. 22, a Parents' party was held in the school, at which a cordial welcome was given to the parents of the scholars attending the Sunday-school. A varied programme of readings, music, games, and songs was rendered, including glees by the choir, and after refreshments had been served, an enjoyable evening was brought to a close by a Humorous Sketch given by teachers and friends.

Blackpool.—The annual meeting of the Lay Church was held on Sunday last, Mr. Cuthbert Grundy in the chair. The retiring Committee was thanked for its services, and re-elected. The year's work had been in church and school a very pleasant one, but the congregation are about to lose some valued members. Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Hibbert, Mrs. Taylor, and Mr. J. M. Taylor are leaving the neighbourhood, and a resolution was unanimously passed expressing great regret at their removal, and thanking them for the good help they had so willingly rendered.

Braintree.—The new school-room, which has been built to meet the needs of increasing work, with generous help from friends, including the B. and F.U.A., was opened on Friday, Feb. 24, by Mr. Frederick Dyer, of London, who, at the tea preceding the public meeting, declared the room open. At the public meeting Mr. Dyer presided, and congratulated the congregation upon the signs of activity prevailing in their midst. The Rev. W. Johnson Cole, Congregationalist, took for his subject: "All work and no play, makes Jack a dull boy," and said he thought there was plenty of room in Braintree for a room such as had been provided, for purposes of education and recreation, and wished it every success. Mr. Fuller spoke of the progress of the Sunday-school and the possibilities of the future; Mr. Draper dealt with "Hobbies and their uses"; and Mr. B. S. Wood, after briefly reviewing the experiences of the congregation, from the time of Mr. McDougall's ministry at High Garrett, to the present, proposed a hearty vote of thanks to all who had subscribed towards the building. This was seconded by Mr. G. Rankin, and carried unanimously. The room is opened, practically free from debt; but a few more subscriptions will be welcomed to complete the furnishing.

Brighton.—On Sunday last the Rev. Alfred Hood preached special sermons at the Free Christian Church, New-road, on behalf of the London Domestic Mission, when £5 3s. 6½d. was contributed to the funds of the Society.

Cardiff.—The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., has been bringing the Press to book, and the local Conservative daily has taken objection to some of his pulpit references. That there is a good deal of truth in Mr. Davis's remarks, and the importance of them, may be judged from the fact that the newspaper in question deems it expedient to devote a leader occupying nearly a column to refute his charges.

Chatham.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, Feb. 19, the preacher in the morning being the Rev. H. S. Solly, of Bridport, and in the evening the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock, the newly appointed minister of the church. On the following Monday evening the anniversary tea and public meeting was held, when a welcome was given to Mr. Hitchcock. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who read some letters of regret for non-attendance, including one from Dr. Brooke Herford. In proposing a resolution of welcome to Mr. Hitchcock, the Chairman referred to his leaving the Church of England, and added that as a Unitarian minister he came to them not as a priest but as a man. Mr. C. Whittle on behalf of the congregation seconded the resolution, and the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock having replied, the Rev. H. S. Solly, who had known Mr. Hitchcock at Bridport, addressed the meeting, and expressed his conviction that in the change through which his friend has passed he had been led forward by a real living inspiration. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards also spoke, and the meeting, which was interspersed with music, closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Chelmsford.—On Wednesday, Feb. 22, the annual meeting of the Unitarian Church was held. Mr. George Chalcraft was called to the chair, and the secretary, Mr. A. Madocks, presented the annual statement of accounts, and spoke hopefully of the future prospects of the church. Votes of thanks were given to Mr. Wray (the treasurer), Mr. Madocks (secretary), and to other members of the church for very valuable and willing assistance rendered in many ways. After the business part was concluded, the remainder of the evening was very pleasantly spent with music, singing, and recitations.

Colyton.—The annual prize distribution in connection with the Sunday-school took place last Sunday afternoon, sixty-four books being distributed to the children by the Rev. A. Sutcliffe, B.A. The school is now larger than at any former period of its existence.

Croft.—The New Year's Social party, a "movable festival," depending on the weather and moonlight, was held on Wednesday, the 22nd ult., when forty persons, young and old, partook of a substantial tea. After tea the meeting increased to fifty. The evening was pleasantly spent with recitations, songs, games, and presentation of books to scholars for good conduct and attendance. The Rev. W. Mason has removed from Leigh, and now resides in the neighbourhood.

Hull.—The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds, gave his annual lecture to the members of the Literary and Social Union and their friends, in the schoolroom of Park-street Church, on Wednesday, Feb. 22. The subject of the lecture was "Helbeck of Bannisdale," and in Mr. Hargrove's able hands Mrs. Ward's story was treated with great sympathy and insight. The audience responded cordially to the vote of thanks accorded to the lecturer.

Ipswich.—On Sunday week Mrs. Pearce, widow of the late Mr. Joseph Pearce, presented to the Friar-street congregation a crayon portrait of herself, as a memento of her ninety-second birthday. The gift was gratefully accepted by Mr. G. J. Notcutt on behalf of the congregation. The Rev. W. Jellie and other members of the congregation joined in the acknowledgments.

Knutsford.—The annual congregational party was held on Wednesday, the 22nd, when over eighty sat down to tea, after which a meeting was held. The chair was occupied by the minister (the Rev. G. A. Payne), who was supported on the platform by the Rev. T. Robinson (who has recently settled as the minister of Hale Chapel) and by the Rev. W. Robinson, F.G.S. After each of these gentlemen had addressed the meeting a programme of vocal and instrumental music gave great satisfaction to the audience. On the following evening the Sunday scholars were entertained to tea, and a magic lantern exhibition, and fourteen prizes were distributed for regular attendance during the past year.

Liscard (Presentation to the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas).—The annual congregational soirée took place in the Concert-hall on Friday evening last, when there was a very large attendance of members and friends. The excellent musical programme was greatly enjoyed. At the conclusion of the first part, the Chairman, Mr. John Birkett, in a few well-chosen words, welcomed Mrs. Thomas to the district, and presented Mr. and Mrs. Thomas with a handsome oak bureau as a wedding gift from the congregation. Mr. Samuel Wellington and Mr. W. H. Travers added their hearty congratulations, referring to the high esteem in which Mr. Thomas was already held, and the continued prosperity of the church under his guidance. In acknowledging the gift, Mr. Thomas said he regarded it as another indication of the spirit of goodwill which the congregation had always extended to him, and which he trusted it would always be his privilege to enjoy. The annual winter treat of the Sunday-school took place on the following evening.

Liverpool: Postal Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 18, when, by the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. J. Coventry, between forty and fifty friends met at the Unitarian Institute, 3, Sandon-terrace. After tea, the chair was taken by Mr. Coventry, and the business began with reading the report, which gave some details as to the way in which the work is done. Advertisements have appeared in eighteen different newspapers, and there have been sixty-three new applications in the course of the year, besides a good deal of work being done among the old correspondents. An appeal was made for more help in the work, which needs a certain amount of preparation to make a thoroughly efficient postal mission worker. But as this preparation mainly consists in reading the literature so as to be able to discuss with correspondents the books sent out, it is interesting work in itself, and leads up to work that is still more so. The statement of accounts was read by the treasurer, and in commenting on the report, some of the subsequent speakers referred to the large amount of work done at a comparatively small cost.

London: Peckham.—The annual tea, prize distribution, and entertainment of the Avondale Band of Hope took place on Thursday, Feb. 23, on which occasion the hall was well filled with members and friends, who greatly enjoyed the amusing ventriloquial and conjuring performance of Mr. F. T. Studd.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The fourth United Teachers' meeting of the session was held in the Pendleton School-room on Sunday, Feb. 19, the president, Mr. H. Woodhead, in the chair, when the Rev. W. E. George, M.A. (Swinton), read a paper entitled "Child Nature." The essayist, in the course of his paper, said: "In recent times a revolution has taken place in the art of teaching. In the old days, little attempt was made to understand the child, no attempt was made to get underneath his outward behaviour into the feelings and motives which prompted it. He was an empty sack, to be filled with knowledge, but always from without; the method was to force into the child the will and ways of life of other people—the child, in fact, was treated as if it had no nature. In our days, however, new methods of education are slowly, but surely, gaining ground; they recognise that children are not the blank, empty vacancies so much assumed under the old style. Each child begins life with tendencies and characteristics of its own, containing within its tender life the possibilities of its future manhood, and it is the business of the teacher to study these characteristics." A discussion followed, in which the following took part:—The Rev. W. R. Shanks and Messrs. Woodhead, Wigley, Robinson, Chadwick and Parry.

Mansfield.—The annual meetings in connection with the Old Meeting Sunday-school on Shrove Tuesday were probably the most successful on record. About 300 partook of tea, and at the after proceedings many were unable to obtain admission. Mrs. Charles Vallance distributed the prizes, thirty in number, hymn-books being awarded to six scholars who had never been absent or late. The entertainment included The Babes in the Wood, William Tell, and The Wrong Box, all of which were capably performed by the scholars. On the following Wednesday evening the performance was repeated to an audience of about 150. On Monday, Feb. 20, a sale of work took place in the school-room of articles left from the Mansfield Stall at the Ilkeston Bazaar. A short programme of music and recitations was provided. Afterwards a lecture was given by the Rev. E. A. Maley on "Newfoundland: our oldest Colony," illustrated by limelight views, which had been specially prepared. The fact that Mr. Maley had resided for three years in Newfoundland caused his description of this little-known colony and its inhabitants to be particularly interesting. The total proceeds amounted to about £11, which will be applied to the fund for the recent improvements at the Ilkeston Unitarian Chapel. The Rev. H. S. Perris's lecture on the Church of England in the course on "What we owe the Sects," is fully reported in the Mansfield Chronicle of Feb. 17.

Middlesborough.—At the second of a series of social evenings held on Tuesday, Feb. 28, a hand some gold curb bracelet was presented to Mrs. H. C. Fisher in recognition of her five years' service as honorary organist of the congregation.

Norwich.—We announced some weeks ago that the Rev. Edgar Daplyn had resigned the pulpit here. After some correspondence, the friendly nature of which is indicated below, the following resolution has been finally passed by the congregation:—"That this congregation having heard read the letter of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn, in reply to the resolution passed at a special meeting held on Jan. 24, asking him to reconsider his decision to resign the pastorate of the Octagon Chapel, or in the alternative, that he would at least allow it to remain in abeyance for another year, learns with regret that Mr. Daplyn has found it impossible to accede to the request made, inasmuch as he had in the interval received and accepted an invitation to become assistant to the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford at Hampstead, and this congregation, therefore, desires, while accepting as it does with much reluctance the resignation of Mr. Daplyn, to place on record its sense of deep indebtedness to him for his services during the past three years, and its thankfulness to him for much good work done, and earnestly prays that the blessing of God Almighty may be his in much abundance while labouring in that distinguished position."

Rotherham.—On Monday week a successful performance of the operetta, "Three Merry Milkmaids," was given in the Mechanics' Hall, by teachers and scholars of the Church of Our Father Sunday-school. The proceeds were for the benefit of the school.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Monday evening, Feb. 27, the Rev. H. Gow, B.A., of Leicester, gave a lecture on "What do Unitarians Believe, and why they do Believe it." There was a large and very attentive audience. At the close of the lecture the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, with much feeling, made reference to the death of the Rev. Robert Spears, who many years ago was minister of that congregation, and whose work was still gratefully remembered. As a token of respect to his memory, the audience rose and stood in reverent silence for some moments.

UNITY CHURCH, DEWSBURY.

A GRAND BAZAAR will be held on SATURDAY, MONDAY, and TUESDAY, April 29th, May 1st and 2nd, 1899.

During the past forty years this Congregation has been assisted by the Yorkshire Unitarian Union with an annual grant of about £70. Conscious of the diminished resources of the Union Committee, we ventured (in view of the largely-increased congregations under Mr. Boughey's ministry) to endeavour to carry on the cause at Dewsbury as an Independent Church.

Unity Church has always been dependent upon a periodic Bazaar, and it has again to appeal for aid in this form; but as a sum of money will soon have to be spent on the buildings, and the purpose is to raise an Emergency Fund to put the independence on a firm basis, it appeals to its friends and the public with more than usual confidence, trusting to the general willingness to help the self-helping.

The Committee of the Union has responded to our Resolution conveying the above intention with the following vote:—

"The Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union congratulate the Dewsbury congregation on their endeavour to secure the independence of the church, and commend their forthcoming Bazaar to the generous support of the Unitarian public."

Contributions in money or goods will be gratefully received by

Rev. J. BOUGHEY, President, Hope-street, Dewsbury.

HENRY DEARDEN, Treasurer, Alexandra-crescent, Dewsbury.

THOMAS SYKES, 36, Ashworth-road, Dewsbury, and G. H. SYKES, Nook, Earlsheaton, Dewsbury, Secretaries.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood, which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., and will be published in THE INQUIRER and Christian Life.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Pilgrimage of Peace, the child of Mr. Stead's enthusiastic imagination, has had to be abandoned, and we cannot pretend to regret it. The proposal seemed to us from the first to verge dangerously on the theatrical, and unlikely to do any service to the cause we have at heart. In last week's War against War, the possibility of the abandonment of the English deputation to the Tsar seems to be also contemplated, and this we should not regret either. The solid part of the movement is in the national demonstration, which has been so striking a success in Town's meetings throughout the country and in the memorials to Lord Salisbury and to the Tsar, which are being extensively signed. It is to be hoped that the National Convention on March 21 will be a decisive meeting, and that the representatives of this country will go to the Tsar's Conference at the Hague, strengthened by an overwhelming expression of the desire of our people in the matter of armaments and arbitration.

THE Tsar can be made aware of the strength of feeling in this country on the subject of his proposals, without the attendance of any deputation, which we cannot suppose that he is very anxious to receive. We are grateful to the Tsar for the initiative he has taken, and the great service his proposal has rendered to the cause of peace; but at the same time it is lamentable to be made aware how helpless his generous nature is to prevent the working out of a Russian policy in Finland, which, so far as our present information goes, seems to be a direct breach of his solemn oath to preserve the liberties of an independent, progressive and peace-loving people.

THE Bishop of Winchester has written to Lord Halifax in reference to the Declaration of the English Church Union, to which we referred last week, expressing surprise that the members of the Union should have committed themselves to the statements, historical and other, which it contains. The summary of what occurred at the Reformation seems to him open to legitimate criticism; and passing from particular points in the declaration, the Bishop concludes :—

"No loyal Churchman, to whatever party he may belong, proposes (I quote your statement) 'to barter the principles of the Church for the sake either of Establishment or endowment.' Will any thoughtful man gravely contend that the ritual questions at issue in the recent strifes can be fairly ranked as fundamental 'principles'? I would ask such men rather: By which alternative are 'the principles of the Church' more gravely imperilled, by the abandonment in a few churches of some ritual accretion, or by the resolve to retain such usages in opposition to the deliberate direction of a unanimous Episcopate studiously anxious to be just? To have asked such a question of John Keble would have been an insult."

THE recent action of the Bishops in Convocation in welcoming the Revised Version of the Bible and sanctioning its use in church is a sign of progress too little noticed amid the noise and confusion of other controversies. When the Revised Version was first issued there was some little excuse for delay in its adoption for public services, on account of the smallness of the type in which it was printed; but the recently issued folio edition meets the need of the most exacting, and is worthy to take its place even on the cathedral lectern. It is a beautiful pulpit edition, which may be had for two guineas, or with the Apocrypha for £2 10s. Bound in turkey morocco, which is desirable with so large a volume, it costs £3 10s., or with the Apocrypha four guineas. Another welcome new edition is that with the marginal references carefully revised.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD writes in this week's Christian World an extremely interesting account of the "Invalid Children's School," which has been established at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock-place. Much has already been done in London for mentally defective children, but this is the first school for crippled children under the control of the School Board, though two other efforts at Stepney and at the Women's University Settlement in Southwark have preceded it. The Settlement provides rooms and a playground, a nurse superintendent and an ambulance, to bring in the children, at a cost of about £220 a year, while the School Board furnished the rooms and provides the trained teacher. The school began with twenty-five children, and is an admirable example of what may be done in other quarters. A three-half-penny dinner is provided for the children, of which we will quote Mrs. Ward's account :—

"The first day it was mutton broth, and rice pudding with treacle. The London child does not naturally take to wholesome food; it is said to take a year to teach a London child to eat porridge, and one little girl announced at once, 'I don't like rice, or sago, or tapioca, or any of them things!' But on the whole, thanks to the treacle, the meal went down well, and under the clever catering of the Settlement housekeeper, Mrs. Russell, the dinners seem to have been so far a steady success. Ten ladies, coming two at a time, divide the daily interval between them. Each pair of friends take a day a week. They help the Nurse-Superintendent serve the dinner, and then take the children out on fine days, either in the playground of the Settlement or in the beautiful garden, shaded with big plane trees, that the Duke of Bedford had recently brought into being at the back of the Settlement. The garden interval is the part of the day to which these children, many of whom are just as full of the restless instincts of childhood as any others, specially look forward. They push each other about in the go-cart; they spin their tops, or they quarrel perhaps, and a helper has to fly to prevent the use of the small crutches for quite other than their lawful purposes. It is pleasant to think that as the trees break into leaf, and the grass gets soft and green, the garden will play a larger and larger part in their school life. It will be possible, perhaps, when the full summer comes, to give many of the lessons out of doors, for there is nothing these delicate children want so much as continuous open air."

THE Rev. Alexander Robinson, the heretic of Kilmun, who on account of the teaching of his book, "A Study of the Saviour in the Newer Light" (1895, revised edition 1898), was in 1897 expelled from the Established Church of Scotland, has been called to the ministry of the Congregational Church at Crieff. At the induction service, the Rev. Dr. Hunter, of Glasgow, officiated, and made the following reference to the crisis through which Mr. Robinson had passed:—

Called and consecrated to the work of the ministry, and endowed with qualities that insured usefulness in it, he was glad that at this crisis of his life Mr. Robinson had not been compelled to turn to any less satisfying form of activity. By that afternoon's service, he need hardly say, they did not profess to restore to him anything which he had lost, nor to confer any additional validity whatever on his claim to resume the work of the Christian ministry. His call and consecration to that work had not been given by man, and by men they could not be withdrawn or restored. His fitness for the ministry was in his own character, spirit, and power, and that inherent fitness, therefore, no ecclesiastical ordination could give, and no ecclesiastical deposition could deprive him of it. There was a Church beyond the Church of Scotland, and a much larger Christian world. Mr. Robinson was still a member of the Holy Catholic Church of Christ, and, as the pastor of a congregation of faithful men, he would be cast more completely on the unity of the Spirit, and be made to feel his oneness all the more in his loneliness and isolation, with the one true Spiritual Church that was within and without all the Churches. There he could stand simply and naturally, and do his work honestly in full sympathy with all Christian communities until the day dawned of a larger and more comprehensive National Church, or till the work of his own little day was finished.

WITH reference to the settlement of the Rev. A. Robinson at Crief, the Revs. A. Shepherd and H. Herbert Snell, of Glasgow, wrote a joint letter to the Glasgow Herald, to say that, although the Congregational Church had chosen Mr. Robinson, it did not follow that he would be admitted as a member of the Congregational Union of Scotland, adding that no one who did not believe in the deity of Jesus Christ and the Atonement has a right "to be acknowledged or call himself a Congregational minister." On this Dr. Hunter wrote to say that Mr. Robinson had no intention of applying for admission to the Union, but that if he had, there was nothing in his views irreconcilable with the theological statement quoted as the basis of that Union. Another correspondent, Mr. William Wilson, wrote:—

I cannot understand Mr. Snell's position at all, for he was once a member of a non-subscribing—a simple Christian—Church, but now seems to think subscription to the Trinity necessary to salvation.

He adds:—

When will the Congregational Union, when will the other churches in the land, have their eyes opened to the truth that they will serve God and Christ best by abolishing creed subscription, by opening their churches to all—Unitarians and Trinitarians alike—who wish to be religious and to worship the Father in spirit and in truth, and leaving people perfectly free in the matter of theology?

On which the Christian World, quoting these sentences, adds:—"That is what it must come to in the end. When, as is actually the case in every considerable Church in the land, people of every variety of theological opinion, from the ante-evolution ideas of fifty years ago to the latest brand of the 'New Orthodoxy,' are worshipping and serving harmoniously together, what is there to hinder our professing as a principle what we are all consenting to as a practice?"

UNITARIAN services have been regularly held for more than two years in Hobart Town, Tasmania, and through the help of the B. and F.U.A. a visit was recently paid to the congregation by the Rev. R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne. Mr. Lambley arrived in Hobart on Friday, Jan. 6, and on the two following Sundays lectured in the afternoon and conducted an evening service, at which the attendances steadily increased. On Thursday, Jan. 19, he delivered a farewell address on "The Principles and Ideals of Unitarianism in the Light of its History"; after which questions were invited, and a conference of those interested in the movement was held. Mr. Lambley strongly urged the establishment of a Sunday-school and a roll of members. On the following morning he left for New Zealand.

IAN MACLAREN, who is at present lecturing in the States, met a hurricane in crossing the Atlantic, and has sent to the British Weekly an account of the experience:—

The wind blew from three different quarters in turn, and the waves were about forty-five feet high. At their base and in the trough they were black; midway upwards they were a very dark green; towards the crest the dark green brightened into emerald, and the waves were crowned with clouds of white foam through which once and again the sunlight broke. As a wave of this size and fearful beauty approached the vessel one felt that it was certain to cover it from stem to stern. If it had, such a wave would have broken in the whaleback deck at the bow, have swept away the boats, possibly might have carried away the officers' quarters forward and even have destroyed the bridge. As it was, the vessel lifted on the approach of the wave, and rose like a seabird on the billows till at last her bow passed through the crest of the wave, while the stream of emerald poured along the side of the vessel, and the white spray was driven by the wind over the bridge and above the funnels. Now and again the crest of a wave would strike upon the beam, flooding the decks with water and making the ship quiver from end to end.

The safety of the vessel through this terrible commotion depended on the perfect seamanship of the captain, who was three days and three nights continuously on the bridge, and it is the judgment of certain on board who had been in many storms and knew the Atlantic well that no man could have shown finer qualities in his profession or discharged his responsible trust with more perfect success. The head of the vessel was ever kept to the hurricane, and the speed reduced in proportion to the head wind. Had the captain made the slightest mistake in the direction of his vessel, or had gone above a certain rate of speed, the result would have been a greater or less disaster. As it was, so cleverly was the vessel managed that during the height of this fearful hurricane, while the roar of the wind was like thunder, and the aspect of the sea like nothing else but the Bernese Oberland as you look at it from one of the mountains, there was not the slightest discomfort for the passengers (at least, those at all accustomed to the sea), and the vessel was really quieter in the hurricane than during some of the moderate gales. The behaviour of the Teutonic was altogether admirable, and she seemed indeed like a thing of life—a marine creature, buoyant and glad, rejoicing in the waves beneath her and the wind which she cut in two.

A MEMORIAL to Mrs. Gaskell was erected at Knutsford some little time ago by Mr. R. H. Watt, an admirer of her novels. It is a beautiful bas-relief, executed by Professor d'Orsi, of the Royal Academy of Naples, and is placed in the front of the post-office. The Sketch of March 1 contained an article by the Rev. G. A. Payne, with illustrations of the old Knutsford chapel and Mrs. Gaskell's grave, as well as of the bas-relief, which shows the expressive and noble features of the gifted authoress, turned slightly towards the spectator, while below "Cranford" is appropriately represented. Mr. Payne gives an interesting account of recent editions of this most popular of Mrs. Gaskell's stories, and also of recent articles in the magazines referring to her and her works.

A MULTITUDE of friends who have delighted in the "Recreations of a Country Parson" will have heard with sorrow of the death at Bournemouth, on Wednesday week, of Dr. A. K. H. Boyd, minister of the University Church at St. Andrews. "A. K. H. B.," born in 1825, though the child of a Scottish manse in Ayrshire, was sent to King's College, London, where he came under the influence of Frederick Denison Maurice, and was subsequently called to the Bar. The Gospel, however, proved in his case stronger than the Law, and after graduating at Glasgow with honours, and going through the divinity course, he was ordained in 1851 to the ministry in the Church of Scotland. Since 1865 he had been at St. Andrews, and had held the highest office as Moderator of the General Assembly of his Church. He was a man of wide influence, and the Country Parson had "Graver Thoughts," but as writer of the charming essays of his "Recreations" he will probably be the longest remembered.

MISS SARA HENNELL, who died at Coventry last Tuesday in her eighty-seventh year, was one of George Eliot's most intimate friends. She was thirty, and Mary Ann Evans was nearly twenty-three when they first met at the house of her brother-in-law, Mr. Charles Bray, at Coventry. The two women were closely drawn together, not only in sympathy, but in intellectual interests and pursuits, yet she and the Brays were completely taken by surprise when George Eliot confessed to them that she was the author of "Scenes from Clerical Life" and "Adam Bede." Miss Hennell was the author, among other works, of an essay on Butler's "Analogy," to which Mr. Gladstone wrote a reply. Her sister, Mrs. Charles Bray, is still living.

THE Sunday School Association has received 132 applications from superintendents desirous of obtaining grants of books for their schools out of the fund lately subscribed for this purpose. A committee has now been appointed to consider the requests made, and to apportion the grants, bearing in mind especially the needs of the poorer Sunday-schools.

WE should be glad to call the attention of our readers to the urgent appeal on behalf of the old Deptford chapel, which appears in our advertisement column. The congregation are obliged to find other accommodation for their services, so that prompt help toward the expense of renovation will be particularly welcome.

A FEW more smiles of silent sympathy; a few more tender words, a little more restraint on temper, may make all the difference between happiness and half-happiness in those I live with.—Stopford Brooke.

ARNOBIUS.—I.

SOME time back, I casually took down from my book-shelves a volume of the Ante-Nicene Christian Library. It happened to be a translation of "The Seven Books of Arnobius Adversus Gentes," and I was struck with the opening sentence of the Preface, which declared that the author "has been most unjustly neglected in modern times." This proved a sufficient inducement to me to read the book. It is true that by some critics the author has been declared to be a man of no account, but it occurred to me that a translator is bound to read his author through and to understand what he says; whereas the critic is by no means certain to do the former, and often gives grievous proofs that he has not done the latter, so that there was an a priori probability that the translator's opinion was the most to be relied on. It may be true that Arnobius did not write classical Latin; but then I have been told that the New Testament is not written in classical Greek, and yet some people have found it worth reading. It is said that the author is verbose, and in some places enigmatical. Well, we have known a great orator of the present age who also was verbose and sometimes enigmatical, whose eloquence was, nevertheless, admired and for many years determined the destiny of a great nation. If the work of Arnobius has been neglected by subsequent ages, that is no reason why the student of history should not be interested in an author who was popular in his day and generation; for we must judge a given age not only by the works which have been approved by succeeding generations, but also, and still more, by the works which were popular when they were written, and which, therefore, enable us to understand the spirit of the age. It might be supposed that the arguments urged against the popular Heathenism of the fourth century of the Christian era have become long ago obsolete. Even if that were so, the argument would have an historical interest for us. But in some respects, which I will venture to specify, this work of Arnobius has in it a singular up-to-date ring.

There are some at the present day who believe that the opinions which a man holds influence his religious life. That view, whether right or wrong, is supported by Arnobius, who says: "Opinion constitutes religion" (VII. c. 37). Arnobius says: "One religion is common to both" (i.e. Heathen and Christian), and our missionary to India recently declared that all religions are in essence one. Arnobius says: "It is dangerous to attempt to prove by arguments that God . . . exists" (I. c. 32). This dictum is echoed in a sermon published this year by the most popular of preachers, who says: "The attempts to prove it (the existence of God) have made more atheists than the arguments of the atheists themselves." Let us devoutly hope that Natural Theology is not taught in our theological colleges—if this dictum be true.

A short time back a writer claimed for a particular form of the doctrine of evolution that it had for the first time removed from the minds of pious men the idea that the universe was made especially for them. But in point of fact there have been writers in almost every age who have raised the protest against such an idea, and Arnobius is one of these.

"Are we to expect that the plans and arrangements of Nature are to be adapted to our temporary wants? Shall we call everything evil which does us no good? Because it interferes with your lawful and, perhaps, unlawful pleasures—would you say that it is pernicious and adverse? Hellebore is poison to man, should it, therefore, not grow? If you wish that your complaints should have a basis, you must first inform us whether the world was created and fashioned for you?" (I. c. 11.) Theodore Parker's account of "a Bumblebee's Thoughts on the Plan and Purpose of the Universe," delivered on the twenty-first of June, in the year one million six hundred and seventeen before our era, before a great scientific convention of Bumblebees, has for its object to prove that "the plan of the Universe intends the Bumblebee as its End and Final Cause." Arnobius would have delighted in this delicious satire. The question whether animals are intelligent beings and have a language of their own has been much discussed in recent times. Arnobius had evidently considered this subject, for he puts into the mouth of an ox, a protest that he is not such a base creature as men are apt to suppose. "How do they know whether I do what I do for my own reasons, and whether that sound which I give forth is my kind of words and is understood by us alone?" (VII. c. 9.)

Arnobius says:—"We Christians are nothing else than worshippers of the Supreme King and Head under our Master Christ. If you examine carefully, you will find that nothing else is implied in that religion." (I. c. 27). This is precisely the definition which some of us would gladly accept. Nevertheless, Arnobius seems to have developed a somewhat original philosophy of the Christian religion and to have treated it as synonymous with Christianity itself—a method surely not become obsolete in these latter days.

There are some theologians in the present day who insist on the Incarnation rather than the Atonement—"Salvation by Incarnation" is the title of a book just published. Arnobius, as I shall point out, urges arguments opposed to the doctrine of Atonement, and insists on a particular kind of Incarnation, by means of which those who are willing may enter on eternal life. He thus teaches the doctrine of conditional immortality which has been advocated in the present century and if we may judge from the reticence as to everlasting punishment in the Free Church Catechism, we are led to suppose that it is the accepted doctrine of the Evangelical Churches, for if they did believe in everlasting punishment, they would surely not be silent on so stupendous a doctrine.

At the present time, great importance is attributed by some to a high ritual and to a sacrificial religion—and the most rigorous protest is raised against them by others. Arnobius goes to the very root of all ritual, however elaborate or however simple, when he says:—"We honour the Gods with this (incense) someone will perhaps say. But we are not inquiring what your feeling is, but what is the feeling of the Gods; nor do we ask what is done by you, but how much they value what is done to purchase their favour." (VII. c. 27).

Arnobius taught that Christ cured the diseases of man without using means; and that he gave others the power to do this in his name both before and after his death. On the other hand, he describes physicians as creatures "earth-born and not relying on true science, but founding on a system of conjecture and wavering in estimating probabilities" (I. c. 48). This mistrust of physicians has certainly been felt through many generations, during which the conflicting theories of medicine have been made the butt of the satirist. Even when definite knowledge has been attained, the power to heal has not grown pari passu. In a recent review of "Medicine in 1898," the writer asserts that "in the treatment of many common complaints the medical man of to-day is as much at a loss for a specific remedy as ever Hippocrates was. He may know exactly the natural history of a particular disease, but he can prescribe nothing whatever to alter its natural history. We complain; but the medical profession have a right to reply that too much is expected of their therapeutics, while too little is credited to them for their work of prevention."—Daily Chronicle, Jan. 9. That may be so, but when the disease is already present it is too late to prevent its advent, and the question is—what has to be done then? The faith of Arnobius in the cure of diseases by Christ without using means, and by those to whom he commits that power, is present with us in the case of the Peculiar People, whose practice is the logical outcome of the mingled mistrust and faith of which I have spoken. When they read in the gospel of Mark of a certain woman who had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, but who was at once cured by her faith in Christ; and when they are told that Christ committed this power to others, so that it was operative so late as the time of St. Thomas of Canterbury, in the opinion of Dr. Abbott, to say nothing of the Roman Catholic faith that miracles of healing are still worked: why should they not trust to the assurance of St. James that the prayer of faith shall save the sick and that the Lord shall raise him up? On one condition, of course, that they have the same implicit faith which was an essential in the olden time. The logic seems unanswerable—if the premises are true. And the dilemma seems plain. Either all orthodox people ought to advocate the principles of so-called Christian science, or renounce the orthodox premises on which this argument depends.

The question of human longevity will always be of interest, especially to those who are growing old; and at the present day we flatter ourselves that life is longer than it used to be. It is worth while our observing, therefore, that Arnobius (it would be interesting to know on what data) fixes the extreme limit of human life at 120 years.

Vegetarianism and teetotalism are subjects in connection with which an honest zeal is exhibited at the present time. Arnobius, to say the least, shows a considerable sympathy with these movements. If he does not abstain from eating meat, he looks upon the practice as a barbaric one. "We half-savage men—nay, rather (to say with more candour what it is truer and more candid to say), we savages, whom unhappy necessity and bad habit have trained to take these as food—are sometimes moved with pity for them; we ourselves accuse and condemn ourselves when the thing is seen and looked into thoroughly, because, neglecting the law which is binding on men, we have broken through the bonds which naturally united us at the beginning" (VII. c. 4).

He is as fully alive to the evils of drunkenness as any teetotaler of the present day can possibly be. He protests against offering to the gods wine which "weakens the strength of all human virtues; which if you take too eagerly you know not what you are doing, you are ignorant of what you are saying, you are at last reviled, and become infamous as a drunkard, a luxurious and abandoned fellow" (VII. c. 30).

If Arnobius had been a favourite author at the present time we might have conjectured that some modern writers had borrowed from him his way of illustrating a subject.

Froude, in his "Siding at a Railway Station," represents all the animals of which he had eaten a part rising up and asking him, through the mouth of an ox, what he had done to justify the sacrifice of so many lives. Arnobius puts into the mouth of an ox a similar speech demanding what innocent animals have done that they should be sacrificed for the sins of mankind. Arnobius says of men: "But if they were to perceive that they are worthless creatures, and that there is no great difference between themselves and a little ant. . . ." (VII. c. 34)—the very idea suggested by the title of the work, "God and the Ant." "Can the ant creep up into the brain of man to see man's world as man sees it? Yet has man, whose whole world is in the eyes of God but as one ant in a universe, thought to creep into God's brain, to see as He sees, to think as He thinks, and to judge the Omnipotent One by man's little laws." "You think," says our author, "that as soon as you pass away freed from the bonds of your fleshly members you will find wings with which you may rise to heaven and soar to the stars. We shun such presumption. . . . You suppose that without the aid of others you will return to your master's palace as if to your own home, no one hindering you. But we on the contrary. . . ." (II. c. 33.) A similar misgiving is expressed by a modern author in a striking poem denominated "Wings."

It is surely interesting to find that this author who wrote some 1,600 years ago, and engaged in a controversy with the heathen which might well be regarded as altogether obsolete to-day, touches more or less incidentally on questions which are now being debated, while he has evidently sufficient insight to appreciate difficulties which have only been emphasised by the greater knowledge of the present age. In the next paper I shall endeavour to show what was the main purpose of Arnobius in writing Adversus Gentes.

LITERATURE.

A MODERN INDIAN SAINT.*

THE modern student of ancient Indian Scriptures, as he reads, and perhaps admires those wonderful records, is apt to question whether the ideals of piety they represent were ever realised, or are at all realisable, by ordinary human beings. In his recent biography of Rāmkrishna, who died in 1886, Professor Max Müller has tried to show that there was, even in our own time, at least one man who had largely lived some of those ancient ideals. Rāmkrishna's was no doubt a unique personality, but as Professor Max Müller himself points out, he was only one of a class of Hindu saints still to be met with in the holy places of India. They are not very widely known even among educated Indians, but it has been my exceeding good fortune to meet a few of them, and I know that there are scores, if not hundreds of this class, still living in various parts of India, whose character and piety would secure their canonisation anywhere. The learned Professor cites only one other name of this class in his book—namely, Pāwāri Bābā of Ghazipur. There are three others mentioned by him, but, strictly speaking, none of them belong to the class to which Rāmkrishna belonged. Both Debendranāth Tāgore, the venerable patriarch of the Brāhmo Samāj, and Dayānanda Saraswati, the founder of the Arya Samāj, are powerful personalities, associated with two most promising religious movements of modern India; but they, as well as the other gentleman, Rai Saligram, whom the Professor cites, are, unlike Rāmkrishna and Pāwāri Bābā, more or less products of Western culture. Rai Saligram was a high official under the Government, and Debendranāth is an English scholar widely read in European philosophy; while Dayānada, though he did not, I believe, know English, had, nevertheless, enough touch with Western ideas to be able to devote one whole chapter of his Introduction to a new commentary of the Vedas to a criticism of the Bible. Rāmkrishna, on the contrary, though he might talk of gas and steam engine, was absolutely innocent of all Western—indeed, of all—culture. He was the product pure and simple of Indian Sādhana—those ethical, spiritual, and psycho-physical disciplines and practices, so common among the religious mendicants of that country—operating upon the popular and current heno-theistic idealism of the Hindus.

Within the last few years a Rāmkrishna cult has grown up in Bengal. The movement, so far, is confined only to a few educated persons, who had come into personal contact with the saint. The most prominent of these, recently dead, was a Professor of Science in Calcutta, and held the position of chemical analyst under the Government of Bengal. There seems to exist everywhere a very short cut from intellectual scepticism to religious supernaturalism; and what Dr. Fairbairn describes as the true history of Dr. Newman's religious life, typifies the mental story of many of the leaders of this new movement. They are all very honest and pious men—deeply earnest souls, whose devotion and self-sacrifice command the respect of all who have come in contact with them. In India, however, cults grow rapidly. There are so many incarnations already that one more or less does not really matter much; so people do not much care to quarrel with them for the claims they set up on behalf of their Master. I am not sure whether Swamy Vivekananda regards Rāmkrishna as an incarnation in the popular sense, but the skeleton story of his Master's life supplied by him to Professor Max Müller, which forms the nucleus of the present work, bears sad evidence of the want of that critical discrimination which we had a right to expect from one like him. The chronological element that might impart an organic unity to the story and help to explain the highly interesting and instructive psychological phenomena presented by it, is absolutely absent in the method of arrangement followed by the Swamy. Consequently the narrative before us is no more a biography than the Fourth Gospel. Professor Max Müller recognises it clearly, and tries to turn this radical defect to good account by presenting it as an object-lesson on what he calls "The Dialogic Process." But this is hardly sufficient compensation for our loss; because, but for this defect, this small book might have given the English-reading public a most accurate and charming exposition of some of the deepest aspects of religious life and thought in India.

In India philosophy is not merely speculative, but highly practical. This is specially true of the Vedānta, of which this biography has been presented to us as an object-lesson. The Vedānta is an inquiry into Brahman—or the Supreme Being; and it is distinctly laid down that the antecedent conditions of this inquiry are discrimination of what is eternal and what is non-eternal, non-attachment to all objects of desire whether here or in the next world, tranquillity of mind, subjugation of the passions, patience in suffering, concentration, meditation, faith and thirsting after salvation. The last is, however, the first step in the process, which culminates in Brahma-Jyānāsa or inquiry into Brahman, and through this inquiry finally leads to that illumination which results in liberation. The Vedānta, it will thus be seen, though a philosophy, is also a system of ethical and spiritual discipline, without which the speculations are as nothing, but which alone raises the speculations to the realm of the highest reality.

The Indian mendicants are not, as a class, very learned men. Rāmkrishna, perhaps, never went to any school whatever. The office which he held in the temple at Dakshineswar, near Calcutta, did not require much learning. As a rule these temple-priests are looked down upon by the other Brahmins as degraded and uncultured. They hardly know enough Sanskrit even to understand the meanings of the formulas they repeat during worship. There is no evidence that Rāmkrishna was in any way more cultured than his class. But he had one thing which few persons of his or any other class have—namely, an intense religiousness, a burning desire for salvation. He thus pre-eminently fulfilled the first pre-condition of Vedāntic culture. He fulfilled the second also: he had faith. This term faith has a peculiar significance in Sanskrit: it does not mean faith in God, but a conviction of truth in the precepts of the Guru (the teacher), and the injunctions of the Sastras (the Scriptures). Rāmkrishna had this faith in a large measure. When he worshipped the goddess in the temple, he approached her as a living and real presence. The image of Kālī appears naturally very hideous to a European, and the worship of such an image is looked upon as a huge monstrosity. A wild, nude figure, as black as night, with dishevelled hair, adorned with a hideous necklace of human heads from which blood is dripping, standing upon the prostrate body of her husband—the picture is not pleasant. But they do not know that in India, and especially in Bengal, a thousand tender and pious sentiments have gathered round this apparently hideous symbol. Another name of Kālī is Chāmunda or Chandi, and the most superficial study of the book which goes by her name and describes some of her exploits in Mārkanḍeya Purāna at once shows that she is only a Vedāntic symbol. Indeed, I once heard a great Samnyasin, who is regarded in some sense as the head of the order in India, a deep Vedāntic scholar, describe this figure of Kālī as a symbol of Bhakti, or love of God. The black colour is symbolic of eternity—love of God being eternal. The string of human heads signifies that it accepts with joy all sufferings even unto death. Nakedness is figurative of freedom, and the prostrate body of Siva on which Kālī stands means that Love can only grow upon Goodness, Sivam meaning, in Sanskrit, goodness. This Samnyasin is innocent of all modern culture, but he is a highly intellectual man: Rāmkrishna, however, was different: he was simply a man of faith. To him Kālī was not an allegory, but a reality—the very god of god; and though this figure was her image, the image was not herself. As he worshipped the image, his heart panted to have a vision of the original. Previous worshippers of Kālī had left behind them the records of their devotional experiences. They had, tradition said, seen her, and entered into living, direct relations with her. One of these who lived in the last century has, through his devotional songs addressed to Kālī, earned an undying reputation in Bengal, as a great Bhakta or devotee. There were other traditions relating to other devotees of Kālī current in the country. Rāmkrishna fed upon all these. And it cannot be denied that some of these hymns addressed to Kālī are inspired by deep devotion, and breathe a high moral tone. "None else is to blame for it, mother," says one; "I sink in the well that my own hands have dug. My passions became as pickaxe and shovel, and with them have I sunk this well in this sacrificial field (i.e., this life); and the waters of death have now filled it." Another hymn represents the devotee in presence of some serious danger or bereavement; but unmoved by it, he cries out, addressing Kālī: "Am I, mother, a child that was born of thee before his time, that I should take fright if thou turnest an angry look upon me?" All these were Rāmkrishna's inheritance; without these he is inexplicable; and he turned them all to the best possible account.

MR. SUNDERLAND ON OUR INDIAN WORK.

THE following extract from a letter just received from Rev. J. T. Sunderland, now of Oakland, Calcutta, will be read with interest, the writer being an expert in our work in India:—

"I am greatly interested in the fine beginning of Mr. Williams' work in India, as I get word of it through THE INQUIRER and through Indian papers which I take. The great field which he finds for our thought and our literature is exactly what I found. I am sure God has given to the Unitarians of England such a mission as has seldom been granted to any religious people before—of leadership in helping a whole vast nation of thoughtful men from an old faith that is sinking and dissolving beneath their feet, to a new faith that is firm and enduring. I am not surprised at the reception which Armstrong's book is meeting with, and the growing demand for Martineau. It is also true that Channing, Parker, Emerson, and all our leading Unitarian thinkers have a work to do in India. I was surprised to find so many men who knew about them, who had one or more of their books, which they were finding bread of life to their souls. I wish there could be prepared especially for India a book (or four small books) on Channing, Parker, Emerson, and Martineau, giving a very brief account of their lives and religious teachings, but especially setting forth with clearness and insight their religious thought, with pretty copious quotations. I believe such a book (or books), published at a very cheap price, would be widely read, and would do a work of vast good. But Mr. Harwood, Mr. Williams, and your Committee can judge of this quite as wisely as I. I believe I talked with you and Mr. Bowie about it when I returned from India."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

SIR,—In last week's advertisement of the bazaar, to be held at the end of next month at Dewsbury, I observe that allusion is incidentally made, and I have no doubt in entire good faith, to "the diminished resources of the Yorkshire Union Committee." From the point of view of our friends at Dewsbury it is quite true: the resources available for assisting them—or should I rather say for keeping them in a state of dependence?—have not only diminished, but totally disappeared. I for one do not regret it either for their sake, or for the general welfare of our cause. The great hindrance to getting real interest taken in the work of the Union has hitherto been the utter want of visible success. As the advertisement states, "during the past forty years the Dewsbury congregation has been assisted with an annual grant of about £70," it has been often more, seldom less; but it is not the amount which is a cause of discouragement, but the fact that there has been no steady diminution of it. To judge (as outsiders must) by the amount of congregational contributions, there has been no steady progress; the record has been one of fluctuations: when things were at the best there seemed no prospect of independence, at the worst there was apprehension that the church would become entirely chargeable to the Union.

Now, Sir, I have neither the right nor the inclination to reproach our brethren at Dewsbury with their lack of success; and if I presumed to do so I should certainly not choose the most promising moment in their history when they are making a determined effort to lift themselves up into the ranks of the independent congregations. By so doing they will give more help to the Union than mere saving of the annual grant, they will help our contention that Unitarianism is not dying out, and encourage our supporters with the assurance that the cause for which we plead is not a forlorn hope.

But my immediate object in writing is to correct the statement about our "diminished resources," which would seem to imply that the effort at Dewsbury is only an enforced consequence of a general failure. Now, this is a matter easily tested, and I think instructive as bearing on the controversy of Unitarian decline in recent years. Of course our income has varied with circumstances, most of all by reason of the varying grants made by the British and Foreign Association according to our claims and needs; but I find the total income for last year was £406; that for twenty-five years ago, when Mr. Blazeby and the late Mr. George Buckton and Mr. Joseph Lupton were the energetic officials, amounted to £409; ten years before that it was under £300; ten years yet earlier under £200. I do not say that these figures are wholly satisfactory, but there are reasons, good as well as bad, to account for the want of progress; nor is it wholly to be regretted if the effect has been to brace Dewsbury to make a manly effort for independence.

The real change has been in the number of claims on the Union. Last year, with an income of £406, our Treasurer was £45 in debt; in 1873, with an income almost the same, the Treasurer had £74 in hand. The fact is, we are doing more work, and giving more help, and extending our interests to the whole county, whereas before they were confined to the West Riding.

I should not have troubled your readers with so much about our local concerns, but that, I believe, what applies to Yorkshire, is much what might be said for all Unitarian England. No, we are not dying out, though our progress is not marked. I, myself, am not stronger than I was a quarter of a century ago—I wish I were; but all the same I am not dying yet.

Leeds.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE LATE REV. ROBERT SPEARS.

SIR,—My affection for the man and intense admiration of the work he did in promoting the cause of Unitarian Christianity, as he conceived it, led me to open THE INQUIRER last week with eager interest to see what it would have to say of him and his labours. Your obituary, as perhaps might have been expected, all too briefly records some of the principal features of the work he engaged in, and, wholly unselfishly, set himself to accomplish. I have not much to complain of in the general scope of the article, except that it does not err on the side of being too warmly appreciative, but there are two sentences in it which, with your love of fair play and constant advocacy of the truth, I should, if you will permit me, like to offer a mild protest against. The first is as to the "sporadic movements which, in addition to his regular ministry," you say Mr. Spears "was generally busy in assisting." If this, in view of the new churches he opened, the fresh vigorous life he brought into others, and the marked success that attended nearly, if not all, the "movements" he led, does not sound something like very unwilling praise, then my perception of the force of language must be getting dull indeed.

The other sentence in your obituary to which I am forced to take exception, is as to Mr. Spears being ever "a fighter." If by this is meant that he loved opposition and rejoiced in obstruction, or that he willingly or knowingly, except on principles that were dear to him, caused dissension, I for one emphatically demur to it. I have again and again in conversation with him known what heartache it gave him to be forced to oppose colleagues whom he loved, but whose opinions and aims he felt at times compelled to dissent from. He never loved fighting for fighting's sake, for a more peace-loving, or kinder-hearted man never breathed; but where principle was concerned, or the foundations of his beloved faith were assailed, he put his whole Christian armour on, stood his ground and "having done all," with his back to the wall, as it were, "stood," in accordance with the apostle's injunction, and as firmly.

Every one knows that he clung tenaciously to what he called "historic Christianity," and that he was unable sufficiently to follow the new school of thought; it was too vague and shadowy, it seemed to him, and led to nothing practical; but differ as many of us might and did on many points of Scriptural interpretation, the true leal-hearted and loving character of the man, his deep religiousness, his utter unselfishness, and unrelenting, unswerving efforts for the spread of Christian truth, as he saw it, won admiration and love from all who knew his devotion to the cause, and his own self-denying exertions to extend it.

I. M. WADE.

[Mr. Wade puts a meaning into our quotation "ever a fighter," as applied to Mr. Spears, which was very far from our intention. There was no "unwilling" praise in our memorial notice, and no sentence grudgingly or ungenerously written.

THE IRISH UNIVERSITY QUESTION.

SIR,—I see with regret the letter of your correspondent objecting to the three able articles by Mr. Street, which show so conclusively that Mr. Balfour's scheme is not one that will be likely to work well in Ireland. What is wanted is peace—the hushing of bitter sectarianism.

Is it possible that the endowment of two colleges, each practically based on sectarian principles, will have the effect of smoothing and healing those differences which the disestablishment of the Irish Church partially softened?

To call such a measure "Justice for Ireland," or for its Roman Catholics, is quite a misnomer. It would be an admission that it is the duty of Government to give special facilities to two sects because they are irate with one another; this can only be done to the prejudice of the rest of the nation. It is time that the nation awoke to the insinuating encroachments of such levelling-up measures: the one sect has its priests that like to creep into power, and control not only the Church, but the State; the other are very much on a par with them, for as honest John Milton said, "Presbyter is only Priest written large." It may be very well to sneer at Mr. Street for desiring statesmanship to be conducted on rigid principles, which are said to be alien to the instincts of the people; but the greatest need of the day is a sounder adherence, both in politics and religion, to sound principles of justice and real impartiality, instead of pandering to popular prejudices.

STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

[If Mr. Balfour's suggestion, as we understand it, could be carried out, the "Presbyterian" University, as Mr. Walmsley pointed out last week, would be not a sectarian, but an entirely undenominational institution.—ED. INQ.]

THE DIFFICULTIES OF CHARITY.

SIR,—Mr. J. J. Wright's article on "The Difficulties of Charity," in your issue of Feb. 25, is excellent, so far as it goes. But he breaks off just where the greatest difficulty of all commences. How is one to know whether a case is "deserving" or not? Here are some elementary rules which may be helpful to the charitably inclined.

1. Never give to a beggar in the street.
2. Never give to a beggar at the door.
3. Never give to any person who calls to ask for donations on behalf of some charitable purpose, without first ascertaining that full accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the charity in question are kept and published. Do not be induced to give by the fact that the applicant has a begging book, containing the names of persons with whom you are acquainted.

4. Never give to a begging-letter writer without inquiry. Especially be careful in cases where the applicant has a letter of recommendation, signed by some clergyman or other minister. Letters containing pious or religious phrases should be at once committed to the waste-paper basket.

5. If there is a Charity Organisation Society where you reside, send every begging letter (and every case of which you have not full personal knowledge) to it for inquiry and report, before deciding to help. Only yesterday, I heard of two neighbours of mine, who each gave half-a-sovereign to a begging-letter writer, long known to the C.O.S. of this town as a rank impostor. The clergy and district visitors have seldom the time, or the means, for making proper inquiries, and their recommendations cannot be implicitly relied on.

6. Study the literature published by the Charity Organisation Society. What are known as C.O.S. Principles of Relief are not the opinions of mere doctrinaires, but are the outcome of long experience and patient study; and they have been framed with the sole object of securing the best interests of the poor, especially the strengthening and raising of character.

JEREMY TAYLOR'S WORKS.

SIR,—In his very interesting article on one whom Emerson has called "the Shakespeare of Divines," Mr. Daplyn says:—"At Golden Grove, too, were written all of his famous works, except a few separate sermons." I shall not contest this verdict, for much depends upon what is meant by famous; but Mr. Daplyn's statement induced me to look into a work ascribed to Taylor, and published after his death, called "Contemplations of the State of Man in this Life, and in that which is to Come." My copy is the seventh edition, and the date is 1707. The circulation of the book at this time was evidently large, and it had been increased by the recommendation of a Dr. Woodward, the rector of Poplar, who made this somewhat curious proposal in the Preface of a funeral sermon preached by him:—

"I have great hope that the distribution of so suitable a book, as Bishop Taylor's 'Contemplations of the State of Man,' at the funeral of the deceased, will be of good use towards this blessed end. And I heartily embrace this occasion to say that the distributing of pious and edifying books at funerals is vastly preferable to the usual presents of rings and gloves, which have no tendency to the noble ends of purifying the heart and life, and of mortifying fleshly and worldly vanity; but do rather too often minister to the contrary; especially the plentiful distribution of funeral wine, by which some have been led into manifest disorder, not to say disgrace"—sic, probably disgrace is meant.

The book, thus commended, is very largely made up of some of the most revolting descriptions of eternal torments that I have ever read. And though not without marks of Taylor's picturesque and forcible style, it would hardly add to his reputation.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Hebrew Theism," by F. W. Newman.
Postures of Devotion.

BETWEEN the body and the mind of man is a close sympathy;
But the mind is the natural ruler, the body is the servant,
Obeying and denoting the inward actions.
The postures of reverence, of desire, of hope are not arbitrary:
They are prompted by nature, and their absence would be unnatural.
So, too, when a man addresses God, if the heart be chastened,
The voice, the countenance, the whole body will duly sympathise;
And if solitude be granted, and no circumstances hinder,
Most natural is it for the worshipper to abase himself before God,
Whether by sinking on the knee or by momentary prostration,
Or by lowly sitting on the ground with face upturned;
Or otherwise, by reverential standing with hands uplifted.
He who waits meekly on his Lord, with collected mind,
Cannot use frivolous motions or careless demeanour;
And though wisdom forbids any painful postures,
Or whatever by its annoyance may distract from devotion,
Yet equally does it dissuade such luxury of ease
As may tend to slumber and to the lulling of the mind.
Strong and weak bodies have their several properties,
Nor may one herein become a law to another.
Yet each who is upright and seeks after God,
Learns easily in what postures he is most collected,
Least prone to wanderings or diversion of thought.
Those postures are to that man rightful and religious.
Let not one presume to dictate absolutely to another,
Yet let none treat these matters as small or unimportant.

There is a scrupulosity which makes some men unhappy
If from morning to evening they have not sunk upon the knee;
As though kneeling were prayer, or were essential to worship.
This is a weakness, and may be called a superstition:
Yet if a man have not yet learned to worship otherwise,
To him the loss is grave when life's hurry forbids to kneel;
And if he persevere in conscientiousness, his weakness will drop off.
More pernicious is the error of that overbold spirituality
Which, trusting to its inward power, disuses formalities altogether.
For though, in the flood-tide of some holy sentiment,
When God's glorious mercy has thrilled through veins and heart,
Worship and aspiration, whether one stand, walk or sit,
May seem natural as breath, in every free interval;
Yet none may expect such heavenly flames to abide

Without his own fostering and without thoughtful effort.

Nay, the more we are favoured by the instirings of God's Spirit,
The more anxiously must we cherish and invite that presence

By sacred meditation and by solemn seeking;

Lest we lose spiritual life by trusting to that which is attained.

By all means then, if possible, live in worship and in aspiration;

But in order that it may be possible, arouse yourself to effort,

Waiting on and seeking after the Unseen at set time and place;

Addressing Him by formal act and in solemn postures,

Not perhaps for many minutes, yet surely with collected earnestness;

Not subjecting your liberty to other men's command,

Yet wisely using the experience of others Until it be superseded by fuller experience of your own.

So shall forms help life, and become full of life,

And nature shall grow spiritual, and God's Spirit be our nature.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN the heart of the City of London lies Guildhall-square, shut in by great buildings from the busy streets, so that the roar of the traffic outside the sheltered spot is hushed, and tame pigeons fearlessly perch on ancient roofs and windows, and pick up the grain that is scattered for them on the ground. The great stone front of the Guildhall looks down upon the square: through its old porch you enter the building which is full of memories of scenes in English history. The stained-glass windows tell many old stories. Dick Whittington and his Cat, so familiar in our nursery days, are pictured on them, and the death of Wat Tyler, and various Kings granting charters at different times to the City of London, and a tournament on London-bridge, and many events, too, that have happened in later times. But of all the stories the Guildhall windows tell, I like the story of the great east window best.

During the Civil War in America, when no cotton could pass from the plantations through the southern ports to cross the ocean to England, our factories and cotton mills in Lancashire and Yorkshire were closed. Then great numbers of men, who earned their living in those mills, were thrown out of work, and their wives and little children were in keen distress and need. Was not this sad news for every one in England? Do you know what happened? A relief committee was formed in London and £500,000 was collected there and in other towns and sent up to the Committee to be distributed among the starving people till the war was over and the mills were opened again. And now for the window and its story. Some years afterwards these poor, grateful people in the cotton districts gathered together a great sum of money in penny subscriptions to place a window in the Guildhall as a memorial of their thankfulness for the sympathy and help shown to them in their trouble.

Here is another story which tells how the spirit of brotherhood and helpfulness was extended, not only through our own little island, but across the wide ocean from America to Ireland. Some fifty years ago the potato crop in Ireland failed, and there was such a famine in the country that the starving peasants fed upon the nettles that grew by the roadside, and failing these, died in their miserable huts. Then far away in the United States of America, men, women, and even children, filled with pity, gathered together stores of food and clothing and grain, and sent a ship laden with these blessings to the famine-stricken land. And Great Britain will never forget this deed.

Now, think what a grand thing it would be if, in the future history of the world, such stories as these of helpfulness and of kindly deeds, done by one nation to another, could, by degrees, take the place of records of wars and all the horrors that follow after war—if nations could learn to settle quarrels by reason and argument instead of by fighting—for, after all, when a battle is won it only shows which of the contending armies is the stronger, not which nation is in the right.

Have you heard of the proposals made by the powerful Russian Emperor about this matter? He foresees the increasing misery that will be brought upon the world by the war-taxes which weigh more heavily on the people every year, and by nations increasing their huge armies and vying with each other to forge weapons which make battles more terrible than ever to contemplate. He has proposed certain ways in which these great evils may be lessened, and people in many towns, in various lands, are meeting together in reply to the Emperor's proposal, to declare that they, too, want to discourage the war spirit, and to help to spread peace on earth.

Now this is the children's column, and perhaps you think children have nothing to do with these matters. But remember, you will be men and women some day if you live, and are now building up the characters and forming the minds by which, in the days to come, you will help to make the world around you better or worse for your being in it. Do you not want to make earth more beautiful and home-like and what God means it to be? Even now you can begin. Some of you are members of Bands of Mercy and Bands of Hope, and you can help on the good work they are doing. All of you can try to prevent quarrels, and by ceasing from the unkind words and selfish deeds, which lead to quarrels, you will waken nothing but kind feelings and goodwill about you. Grow up brave and fearless; but resolve, too, that you will be tender, and pitiful, and helpful, and that you will try to spread abroad the spirit of brotherhood which teaches us that all the people in the world are alike the children of our loving Heavenly Father.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

THE question of the religious instruction of the children growing up in our homes and in our schools must be felt by all earnest minds to be of the very first importance. We may trust that the old fallacy about not biasing the minds of our children is at last completely exploded, and that we may not again have seriously to answer the plea that because we believe in freedom of thought and the progressive nature of religious truth, therefore we are to do nothing to help our children to a clear apprehension of that truth. Cruel wrong has too often been done in the past, where children have been left in the critical years of most impressionable growth, with vivid imagination and mind full of eager questions, without guidance from those who had the first right to touch in them the deepest springs of affection, and the inalienable duty to give a true guidance to their thought and aspiration.

The first teaching of religion or of indifference to religion must be in the home. It does not begin with instruction, but by the subtle influence of what is in the parents' hearts, or, if they unhappily are much separated from their children, in the hearts of those who are habitually closest to the little ones. Happiest are the children who grow up to know, without much talking about it, the meaning of reverence, and humble, joyful trust and the love of God, and the strength of passionate loyalty to righteousness and truth in those whose love makes their home and constantly enfolds their lives.

That religion takes the firmest hold which passes without words from father and mother to the child. And yet there must also be instruction, even from the earliest years, or the little ones will make out the quaintest theology of their own, and afterwards very likely fall a prey to the misleading of some other earnest but perverse teaching. It is a wonderful appeal the little ones make, first that there shall be absolutely genuine religion in their home—no pretence, no shirking of the solemn reality of life—and then that there shall be clear, true thought and wise teaching. They are the great educators of their parents, at least of all parents who do not shut out of their hearts this most precious gift of God.

Thus the question arises in many homes, "How shall we best teach them? What shall we tell them about God?" And in the present day, when there has been so much movement of religious thought, there have been special difficulties, and many parents have sorrowfully turned away, because they had no clear convictions of their own. To any such, who may be still seeking for themselves the true foundation, and to all who desire help in teaching their children, we would commend the following letter, which has just been issued:—

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE.

Everyone recognises the necessity of careful instruction in the preparation of young people for a business or professional career, and the means for such instruction were never so abundant as now. It must surely be equally clear to thoughtful persons that young minds need intelligent and sympathetic guidance in the paths of duty, and help towards meeting the trials of life—not least the trials and perplexities connected with religious thought.

It is especially necessary, at the time in their life when they are most exposed to the dangers of scepticism on the one hand, and of undue ecclesiastical authority on the other, that they should be led into habits that will enrich their character and enable them both to keep a firm faith in goodness and in God, and to be able to give a reason for the faith that is in them.

Many have recognised all this, and the wish is often expressed by parents and teachers that some book or books might be published which they could use with confidence in trying thus to educate the noblest side of their children's nature. The purpose of this letter is to show how far this wish has already been provided for; and to indicate, among the many publications written on the subject, a few books which can be confidently recommended to parents who are willing to devote a little time to systematic religious teaching in the home circle.

However limited a parent's time and circumstances may be, it is still possible to do good and even invaluable work, by a wise and diligent use of one or more of the works named as appropriate to the child's age. Several books are also named for the personal study of young men and women.

If this letter should fall into the hands of anyone who would like special assistance in the choice of books from the list given on the other side, or referred to elsewhere, a request to any one of the undersigned will receive careful and sympathetic attention.

BROOKE HERFORD, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

W. G. TAERANT, Chairman of the Book and Tract Committee.

ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec. of the Sunday School Association.

Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C., Feb., 1899.

Then follows a classified list of books which, together with copies of this letter, may be had from the Book Room at Essex Hall. The books specified begin with three for quite young children, followed by others for older children, and, again, others for young men and women. Between the "Outline Lessons in Religion" and "God and the Soul," by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, we should have been inclined to add "Man's Knowledge of God," as an intermediate stage, and to "Life in Palestine when Jesus Lived," by the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, we should certainly add for young people seriously taking up the study of the New Testament, his "First Three Gospels." But our chief purpose here is to urge upon all those who are interested in the welfare of our children and young people the very earnest consideration of this letter and the plea it makes. With the books indicated they can make a very good beginning, and in the fuller catalogues to be had from Essex Hall they will find how abundant is the store of really good and helpful religious literature.

THE KISS OF GOD.

BY JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

WHEN the great leader's task was done,
He stood on Pisgah's height,
And saw, far off, the westering sun
Drop down into the night;

Saw, too, the land in which, alas!
He might not hope to dwell
Spread fairly out; and then—for so Talmudic legends tell—

Jehovah touched him, and he slept;
And smooth the mountain sod
Was levelled o'er him, and 'twas writ,
"Died by the kiss of God."

The kiss of God! We talk of death
In many learned ways,—
We know so much,—which of them all
So simple in its praise

As this which from the oldest days
Has treasured been apart,
To comfort in this heel of time
The mourner's aching heart?

We walk our bright or desert road,
And, when we reach the end,
Bends over us with gentle face
The Universal Friend.

Upon our lips his own are laid:
We do not strive nor cry.
The kiss of God! Upon that kiss
It is not hard to die.

THE BEAUTY OF HOLINESS.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH MAY.

IN every community there is a cheap scepticism of virtue much above the common. "Be not righteous over-much," it says to its members, in the words of the despairing preacher of old. "Conform to existing standards. Be about as good as your neighbours. Let their judgments be your law, and be comfortable." This settles the question for most of us. In fact, we usually fail even to see anything much better than what is realised about us in characters of average men and women. "This is the way our fathers did." "All my neighbours do thus." How hard it is to improve custom, to follow the ideal, when it exposes you to the sneer or the laugh of those to whom all individuality is eccentricity, and who dread the stare of society more than the reproach of conscience!

Above all this we must rise. He who would attain a genuine virtue must look within, not without. No judgment realised in the social conscience can ever exhibit more than a certain moderate moral elevation; for it is an average of the convictions of many individual consciences, the majority of which are, relatively to each period, imperfectly improved. What society thinks and feels must always be more or less below what the aspiring individual soul will discern and admire. He only then will rise whose dependence is on himself and on the inspirations of God, and whose devotion is strictly to the ideal. The prime condition of moral progress, of a living virtue worthy the name, is, as I just said, that one should have come to see the beauty of holiness, to feel the charm of perfection in character, of purity of motive, taste, desire. So long as virtue is a task, we shall hardly improve; for he who performs a task is content when he has satisfied its narrowest exaction. We must be inspired by an ideal, enamoured of a vision; that, as an artist gives his days and nights not merely unwearyingly, but ecstatically, to bringing out some image of grace and loveliness, so it will be to us not only a gratification, but the absorbing delight of our lives to refine the growing image of God in our souls, to complete its outline, to perfect each feature, to round all into conformity with the absolute ideal which is more and more clearly revealing itself to our gaze.

What we ought to aim at, then, in ourselves and for our children, is, first of all, the vivifying of the love of excellence; the quickening of spiritual taste, so to speak; the awakening of spiritual desire. Let us, so far as possible, cease to present the virtues as instances of moral law, but rather offer them as ideals of moral beauty. Give a man an ideal, and he will sacrifice everything for it, and count the cost as nothing. Reveal the beauty of holiness, of character rounded into perfect symmetry; make youth feel about moral as they are apt nowadays to feel about physical development; make them in love not only with goodness, but with the ideal of perfectness in goodness, and you have done the essential thing. If that vision does not fade; if, as the world closes around the young spirit, he can keep his ideal undimmed, as the young knight of old watched his armour that not a stain should be found upon it; if, indeed, he can feel about virtue as those knights in their better period felt about the chosen principles to which they pledged themselves, and which were thenceforth involved in their honour—that is, if he can feel chivalrously about it—then in a modern day we may hope to have our Galahads again!

But let me add an important remark. The prime condition of uncalculating, idealistic virtue obviously is that we should see in ourselves organisms capable of perfection. The soul must not be deemed an accident of the physique, but known as a vital principle endowed with its own life, its own powers, and pursuing a career for which the period of its connection with the physique (whatever that connection be) affords no adequate opportunity.

If we are to aim at an ideal, at perfection—things infinite in their nature—we must be constitutionally free from all limitation. Morality may exist, perhaps, as a regulative influence, as a principle of expediency, when a high conception of human nature has been abandoned. But there can be no idealistic virtue, there cannot be holiness, from the mere assumed defect of opportunity to complete a work which by its nature is of an infinite character; that is, which admits no conceivable limitations in the nature of its result.

Thus the idealistic longings of the human spirit confirm its self-consciousness as a spirit. The impulse to a perfect virtue, the impulse to holiness which has never been unfelt among the noblest of our race in developed and healthful periods, witnesses to our eternal quality, and makes a materialistic philosophy as unreasonable as it is demoralising.

And so also we see the congeniality of religion with a living virtue, if not its essentiality to it. Profoundly the spirit of man is helped by having before it a perfect ideal in God. Grant that one's defined conception of the divine character can be no more perfect than his own thought, still there is, beyond and above that, the impressive sense that, though the man cannot image it to himself, the absolute perfection is there. To the soul enamoured of virtue, dedicated to holiness, the inconceivable moral excellence of Deity is a fountain of inspiration from which it may ceaselessly draw. There it may continually refresh its ideals, renew its faith, revive its courage.

And, finally, what a precious support the faith, the living sense, that, in one's efforts after excellence, one has the unwavering, loving, waiting sympathy of the all-perfect Spirit! Nowhere is the soul more likely to be isolated than in its moral efforts. Into the struggles of character with itself the human confidant can seldom be admitted. Yet how often must aspiration and effort long for the sympathy of a friend! When conscience has placed you in opposition to the multitude, how much you may need the support of a friend! That is what God has been for many, many a tried, aspiring soul! That is what He is waiting, ever, to be to each one of us! And to the knowledge of God, to the discovery of the Infinite Friend, there is no door wider open than that of moral aspiration, the endeavour after holiness. He who unselfishly dedicates himself to virtue, whose ideal has become perfection, who has caught a gleam of the "beauty of holiness," has actually entered into sympathy with God, has fastened with joy upon the attributes of God, and to his willing spirit the revelation of God shall not be long denied.

PRAYER AND THE DIVINE PERSONALITY.

IN writing an article on "Prayer and the Reign of Law," published in THE INQUIRER a little over six months since, I felt that that subject was inseparably connected with the one which I am now to discuss. Just, indeed, as certain otherwise thoughtful men and women have either ceased to pray, or feel themselves greatly perplexed about prayer, because of their confused notion of "the Reign of Law," so either the very same doubters or the same deniers, or men and women of like notions, have either ceased to pray or have begun to feel as if prayer were in all ways questionable, because of what they take to be the kindred question of the Divine Personality. They have, perhaps, seen this great and solemn subject, or, rather, certain men's conceptions of it, most mercilessly ridiculed, or they have themselves so wholly misconceived the subject, in all its bearings, as to be tossed about by uncertainty, their higher instincts pointing in one way, while what they call their impressions point in another. Feeling, as is inevitable, that they cannot pray to a "stream of tendency," or to an "infinite moral ideal," or to a "blind force," seeking, all unknowingly to itself, some point at which it can "well up" in self-consciousness, and having been assured by some dogmatic, and, therefore, self-contradictory, agnostic that God "cannot be a person," they have tried to settle themselves in the conclusion that prayer is meaningless and useless, both for themselves and other people. If, indeed, their premises were sound, their conclusion would not be amiss; for, to me at any rate, it seems certain that men and women cannot pray to an abstraction, or to an ideal, or to a "blind force," or to any other verbal or "ideal substitute for God," and that, if there be not a most real response on the part of the Eternal and Infinite source and centre of all things, to our highest conceptions of personality, as distinct from impersonality, then prayer cannot live, but must die of asphyxia or of sheer inanity.

No one, however, who has given the least thoughtful attention to the subject can fail to see that it is largely a question of the meaning of terms, especially of the terms that are central and vital. What, then, do we mean when we talk or write of the "Divine Personality"? That we do not thus mean to say that God is a person in the original Latin sense of a persona, a mask, or character, like the personæ dramatis with which we are all more or less familiar, may be taken for granted, though we cannot help remembering that that derivative sense of the word has played a memorable part in the great historic discussions concerning the "persons" in the Godhead, from Nicene days to the memorable "Trinitarian controversy" in our own land at the end of the seventeenth century, and onwards to the present time. It is a most intricate question; but I venture, in all humility, to affirm that to take the "Divine Personality," as it occurs in the question of the Trinity versus the Unity, in the sense of a persona dramatis, is still the easiest and most manageable sense that can be given to it in such a connection, even though, in that case, it logically and inevitably leads not merely to a threefold but to a three-hundred-fold or a three-thousandfold, or, better still, to an indefinitely manifold manifestation or mode of the Eternal and Infinite God.

But, dropping that impossible or inadmissible sense of the Divine Personality, we may go on to say that God cannot be a person in the sense of a limited individuality or in the contracted sense in which men, women, and children are persons as distinguished from things; and, in fact, it is certain that many of those who deny what they call the "personality of God" confine their denial to the purely humanised conception of it, thus indicated and discarded. But the more one looks at the essence of personality, the more one sees that limitation is no part of it, but only one of its accidents as found in our own personality and in that of our fellows. The essence of personality, surely, is the union of intelligence, will, and character; and, so far from there being any special difficulty, either for prayer or anything else, in our thus being led to conceive of God as the Infinite Intelligence, the boundless Power, and the perfect Righteousness centred in one unspeakable Unity, it is the only way in which we can think of Him, if He is to be a living reality to us as intellectual, volitional, and moral beings. Contemplating the Divine so, we see at once that, in that sweeping twofold division of the boundless whole of entities into persons and things which is inevitable, God cannot be a thing but must be a person in the essential sense of the word. Not that we can afford to forget that, as Herbert Spencer has reminded us, the real question may be not as to the "Divine Personality or something less," but as to "the Divine Personality or something more." No; the "something more" must be allowed for if it comes to trying to say all about it, which no wise man ever ventures to do; and, meanwhile, we must be content to know, or to believe, that, whatever the unfathomable God may be in Himself, He yet assuredly does reveal Himself to us as the boundless Intelligence, the sovereign Will, and the perfect Righteousness, inhering and cohering in the One, and, therefore, as the Transcendent Personality in direct contact and communion with our several and collective finite personalities.

If, then, we may be permitted, or must be compelled to think of God so, and if it be part of our personal experience so to realise God to our personal selves, then it follows that prayer, in the sense of direct intercourse and communion between God and our souls, so far from being a difficulty, is at once in perfect harmony with pure instinct, sure conviction, and ever-growing aspiration. "Our Father which art in Heaven" is thus still, with renewed meaning and fresh inspiration, just the spontaneous language of the human soul when it is true to itself and has not been spoiled by half-knowledge, by semi-philosophy, by flippant criticism, or by sheer materialism. The alternative to such a conclusion is a dead God, which, in a world of boundless life like ours, is an unthinkable absurdity; or a blind God, which, in presence of endless intelligences, is a mockery; or a God who is mere fate, which, in a world of free spirits, is worse than a "twice-dead paganism," plucked up by the roots; or an unmoral "somewhat," which, for essentially moral beings like ourselves, is a hopeless and helpless non-entity; and that all such alternatives are quite out of the question goes without saying. From all such impossible issues, we turn away and find our rest in the thought of God as the supreme Reality behind all semblances, as the eternal ground and cause of all phenomena, as the centre, source, and end of all our best ideals, and as the Father of our spirits who dwells in us and we in Him; and Prayer, in such a case, is as easy and natural, as spontaneous and simple as the daily contact of the material side of us with our material environment, or as the fellowship of the moral and spiritual side of us with the moral and spiritual universe, or as the communion, spoken or unspoken, of father and child.

If, then, we wish to be thoughtful and philosophical, devout and prayerful, at one and the same time, this great and solemn question of the Divine Personality cannot hinder us but ought to help us, if we will dare to face it, not to look at it only but to look into it as well. While, indeed, "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing," in the sense originally intended, there is an equally sure sense in which a little thought, especially on these deeper questions of God and the soul, is a very "dangerous thing" indeed, it is yet equally certain that, just as great and full knowledge removes the difficulties of the knowledge that is small and incomplete, so bold and strenuous thought, on these high themes, clears away the doubts that come of the thought that is rash and incomplete. In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, it will be found that the men and women who tell us they cannot pray to God, because "God cannot be a person" and so must be a dead thing, are bewildered not by the fact but by utter misconceptions and sheer misrepresentations of the fact. Let such darkened and troubled souls resolutely grip the fact itself, and then they too, like many of ourselves, will find that that which delivers them from bad philosophy and still worse theology is also the angel of mercy to save them from the prayerlessness in which neither true religion nor true philosophy nor true theology can live, and to lift them into that higher sphere in which the fullest knowledge attainable, the best thought possible, and the most fervent prayer of the deepest souls, so far from being alien to each other, are true yoke-fellows, or glad and willing helpers of each other's peace and strength and joy.

WILLIAM MELLOR.

FAITHFUL PIETY.

MRS. JONES (the name will serve as well as any other to hide the personality of her to whom these lines refer) was an elderly Welsh lady, hailing from Cardiganshire, with practically no English at her command beyond that small vocabulary which was necessary to carry on her daily duties. She had a milk walk in one of the districts of the metropolis, and on Sundays was a regular attendant on the ministrations of the Rev. Thomas Belsham. To most of her fellow-worshippers she was a great puzzle; they could not make out what possible benefit she could derive from the services. To one of these, who somewhat impertinently put the question to her, she could only reply that she did not exactly know, but she felt that her Sunday home was just there—just there where she felt happy, and where she knew all was right when Mr. Belsham was in the pulpit.

I have often thought of this dear old faithful dame. She had her strong convictions, and was true to them in the best way she knew how. She might, of course, have attended the services at the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel, then at Wilderness-row, now in Jewin-crescent; and she might have heard John Elias, the mightiest Welsh preacher of his day, as he was threatening the terrors of the law and describing the pyrotechnics of the world to come, to a crowded audience of trembling sinners from her own native land; but these oratorical displays would not have affected her, except, it may be, to rouse in her a feeling of disgust, or to drive her into the arms of a blatant helpless infidelity like that of Richard Carlile. They would certainly not have helped her to the possession of that spiritual peace which is so desirable and necessary to one in her position, who has to withstand much storm and stress in her everyday life.

So rather than join her Welsh brothers and sisters under such conditions, she found it conduced more to her comfort to go to Essex-street Chapel, without any English, and thither she went Sunday after Sunday, with a persistent regularity which might have put some others to shame, and which doubtless somewhat surprised, although it must have pleased, the good old pastor himself; in all weathers, hot or cold, wet or dry, Mary Jones was always found punctually in her place. And why not? She might not have understood the preacher's grandiose Johnsonese, which no one, by the way, will condescend to read to-day, but which then tickled the ear and pleased the fancy, and, there is no reason to doubt, helped the devotions of the rest of the audience; but we have reason to be deeply thankful that the avenues of the spirit are not confined to the approaches of oratorical eloquence alone. This is well known to all Quaker communities. In many and various ways have mankind, with heaving heart and groping hands, been led to touch God's right hand in the darkness, and been lifted up and strengthened.

Worship is not necessarily nor chiefly an experience of the reason and intellect. The old lady went to Essex-street because she found she could worship there. She went with her warm Welsh heart, and found herself there in touch with the Infinite and Eternal, feeling within her the throbbings of the mighty powers of another world. When the organ poured forth its music, which was neither English nor Welsh, she found sweet memories flowing in upon her, and felt, as did Robert Collyer in Athanase Coquerel's French Church in Paris, that she was in touch with kindred souls far away. She was present in the body in Essex-street, but in spirit she was in a sense wandering: lesson and hymn, prayer and sermon, though they might not touch her understanding, put her into immediate telephonic connection with her brother and sister worshippers in her far-off native land. Time and space form no obstacle where love is at work. Past, present and future are sometimes blended into one in the soul's experience. She would remember, may be, how as a child she went with her father and mother and the rest of the family and worshipped at Llwyrhydown, the venerable David Davis, of Castle Howell, conducting the service in a language which is now more sacred to her than ever; and, perhaps, she would recall that oft-repeated discourse of his on the Prodigal Son, so much talked of by every one that heard it, and never preached but it left the congregation overwhelmed with feeling and shedding tears of purest joy; or, perhaps, again, she would recall some particular visit to the new chapel at Pantdefaid, attracted thither by the growing reputation of the then young preacher, the Rev. John James, who by his fiery eloquence could rouse an audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. There was in her case no lack of spiritual resources. The candle of the Lord which had been lit in her bosom as a girl in her native Wales—like that votive lamp which is sometimes met with in wayside Catholic chapels on the Continent, kindled by the piety of one generation and never suffered to go out by that of another—she kept burning by her own personal piety. And many a time and oft, amid the toils and troubles incident to such a life as hers, she had been enabled to pierce the gloom and catch a glimpse of the Eternal purpose; and when the last dark days were closing around her, she would doubtless still find its gentle rays falling upon each succeeding step, and pass on feeling the Everlasting Arms beneath her.

R. J. JONES.

WE strongly advise every minister and secretary of a congregation contemplating the adoption of the Marriage Act of 1898, to procure and carefully study the Rules and Regulations for the guidance of Authorised Persons and Trustees or Governing Bodies adopting the Act, issued by the Registrar-General, with the approval of the Local Government Board. A copy may be had through any bookseller for 2½d., from Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. For ourselves we should look more than once before we leapt into the meshes of these Rules and Regulations, and undertook the burdensome task they impose on the Authorised Person. Fines not exceeding £50, and imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding two years is what the Authorised Person is liable to, who fails duly to carry out the provisions of the Act and to observe the elaborate regulations now imposed. There is no doubt as to the thoroughness of the regulations. They fill twenty-six good sized pages, and direct, among many other things, that "the ink used in making certified copies should be of a good black colour, and of permanent quality," and that "the writing should be distinct and bold, and without flourishes."

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled —"JAMES EPPS and Co. MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches was held on Monday evening, March 6, in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, the President, Mr. G. H. Leigh, in the chair.

The TREASURER's statement showed in the general account a balance of £36 17s. 11d. in hand, congregational collections having amounted to £75 15s. 7d., and subscriptions to £109 19s. In the Forward Movement account, congregational contributions amounted to £105, and subscriptions to £275 4s. The account was balanced by a transfer of £9 11s. 1d. from the general account.

The eighth annual report of the Governing Body stated that the heavy and anxious character of the work during 1898 might be gathered from the fact that the Committee held altogether forty-six meetings. A great deal of important and tedious investigation had had to be made, and yet the work was so slow that at present they had but little to show for their labour. It seemed, at first sight, an easy matter to erect buildings when the needful money was in hand, but the difficulties and responsibilities were surprisingly great when the labour was commenced. It had necessitated sixteen meetings of the Buildings and Sites Committee, and many journeys of inspection by individual members of the Committee, to secure suitable sites at Urmston and Bradford, and settle upon plans of building which were calculated to suit the case. It had been no simple task to arrange the current work of the Forward Movement churches, and to fill up the vacancies caused by the resignations of the Revs. D. Agate and W. H. Burgess. It was felt that these positions must be occupied by men peculiarly qualified to fill them, and hence the greatest care and judgment had to be exercised. The Rev. W. E. Atack had been at Bradford now nearly a year, and they were pleased to record the highly satisfactory way in which the work there was developing under his guidance and influence. The Rev. W. H. Burgess had left the district, taking with him many proofs of the high regard and esteem in which he was held, and was now settled at Accrington, while his work at Chorlton-cum-Hardy had been taken up by the Rev. J. Ruddle. The Rev. Priestley Prime, of Torquay, had been appointed as missionary for Heaton Moor and Urmston, and would commence his duties early in April next. At Chorlton the members on the register numbered sixty-eight. The church finances were in a healthy condition, and in connection with the provision of a church and school building, for the completion of which it was hoped to raise about £2,300, it was expected that building operations would be commenced within the next month or so. At Heaton Moor, though the number of members showed a slight decrease, attendances and offertories showed marked signs of improvement. At Urmston a slight falling off in the membership had to be reported, but the offertories showed a slight increase over last year. There was a small increase of membership at Bradford, the Sunday-school was growing rapidly, and other agencies in connection with the church had been carried on with success. Notice of the work at Blackley, Dob lane, Hale, Middleton, Moss Side, Oldham, Oldham-road, Pendleton, and Swinton was also added. In conclusion, the report stated that the Governing Body of the Association regarded with feelings of satisfaction and pleasure the arduous labours of the past year, and the encouraging life and activity manifested in the churches. The business undertaken by the Association had in many ways been very difficult, but the large attendances at the meetings of the Governing Body and its various committees, coupled with the earnestness and harmony of the proceedings, had enabled all to co-operate cheerfully together. The Postal Mission report was appended, showing that the work had been carried on with as much vigour as heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said all who were interested in the work of the Association were also deeply concerned with the welfare of the older churches in connection with it. He felt particular pleasure in being able to testify that the congregations appeared to him to be in a very healthy, satisfactory, and hopeful condition. He thought they had every reason to look forward to a period of extended zeal and usefulness in connection with those various congregations. In the report would be found an interesting record with regard to the Forward Movement, and he thought they might well feel satisfied if they looked at the work done by the Forward Movement churches. They were all placed in great and growing centres of population, and there was a large and increasing sphere of usefulness for each and all of them. He was sure the Association was doing a very valuable work, and he looked forward with very great interest and encouragement to what was still to come in the future.

Mr. W. C. MILNES seconded the motion, which was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN moved, and the Rev. DENDY AGATE seconded, the following resolution, which was carried unanimously :—

That this annual meeting of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, gratefully remembering the generous help given to the grand bazaar by the London stall, and sympathising heartily with the objects of the similar effort which the London District Unitarian Society has undertaken, recommends the Governing Body to offer a Manchester District stall to the London bazaar, and to undertake the arrangements required for its efficient organisation.

The Rev. G. KNIGHT moved :—

That the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, in annual meeting assembled, hereby records its deep and cordial sympathy with the beneficent intention of the Tsar's invitation of the representatives of the civilised nations to consult as to practical measures for the reduction of armaments and the securing of peace and goodwill among men. It gratefully thanks Her Majesty's Government for its prompt consent to join the Conference, and humbly requests Lord Salisbury to instruct the representatives of Great Britain and Ireland to use the influence of this great nation in obtaining a successful issue to the deliberations of the Conference.

He said he had looked at the Rescript all round and at some of its most obvious bearings, as, for instance, what would be the effect of war between two such great nations as Britain and France—what would be the loss of life, of property, of trade, of friendly feeling, and of kindness; what would be the results of the great armaments that were being increased from time to time; how much longer were the people to be able to endure the exactions that the support of those armaments necessitated. Then he felt what a check a great war would be to the process of civilisation, of understanding each other, and of coming into closer touch with each other, if the nations of Europe should ever come to fight. The need of the nations was peace, and it would be a great boon to some of those nations if they could disarm at once, seeing also that an easier and more excellent way of settling international disputes was now apparent, and should be at once adopted. No people should be more ready to give a welcome to the Rescript of the Tsar than the representatives and members of the Free Churches, whose religion made for peace.

The Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON seconded the resolution. A suggestion made from the body of the hall that a rider should be added to the resolution calling for the intervention of the Tsar in favour of constitutional liberty in Finland was not accepted by the Chairman, no notice of it having been given.

The resolution was put to the meeting and passed unanimously.

The Rev. C. J. STREET, of Bolton, next delivered an address. He said that when he thought of the Forward Movement in the Manchester district he thanked God and took courage. He could not forget the happy time he had spent in the district. Six years ago that night he stood on that platform at the request of the Committee to speak on the subject of Missionary work, and he urged a Forward Movement scheme, with the raising of £400 a year for three years with which to maintain the work; churches were to be started in the suburbs, and a missionary appointed to start them and carry them on. The scheme was received with great favour. The Governing Body accepted its main principles, and the first attempt was made at Heaton Moor. A most suitable missionary was found in the Rev. D. Agate. In the following year Bradford and Urmston were started, and then the increased demands of the work were met by the appointment of the Rev. W. H. Burgess, as assistant missionary, for Mr. Agate took special oversight of Chorlton, which placed itself in the hands of the Association. At the end of three years the Forward Movement subscriptions were renewed for another three years. Then there was the bazaar which realised nearly £10,000. Each of the Forward Movement churches was flourishing, and would have a building of its own very soon. Many of the older churches had also been strengthened and materially helped. There had been difficulties, of course, and perhaps some disappointments; but the Forward Movement had been justified by the events. Now, he asked, where do we stand? Are we to rest on our oars? Is it time to stop? The subscription list must be again renewed; new work must be undertaken; the present century ought not to close before another church is started. Where? It would not be difficult to determine that. It would be wrong not to ask the subscribers to continue their subscriptions for another three years, and to assure them that we are prepared to engage in other new work. It would be a good thing to have once again a district missionary to go round and stir up old causes as well as new ones. A three months' mission would be an admirable thing for renewing the life of the district churches, commencing, say, next October; and he thought that the right sort of man could be found without much difficulty.

The Rev. W. E. ATTACK followed, and described the work in which he was engaged at Bradford, how the church there was the means of taking brightness into the people's homes, and removing them out of temptation by its uplifting influence, both social and educational. There was a steady growth and development which was encouraging; and he had full reason for hoping that when the building was erected their numbers would so increase that the folk themselves would be able to defray the purely local expenses of the place, poor though the district is.

The Rev. JAMES RUDDLE, the newly-appointed minister at Chorlton, also spoke, and thought it would be a good thing for rousing enthusiasm if it were possible to induce some of their laymen who had really been benefited and converted by their Unitarian Gospel, to come on the platform and relate their experiences. It would really be interesting and refreshing to listen to men who were living illustrations of what we are seeking to do in our churches.

The proceedings of the evening were enlivened with music ably rendered by the choir of the Longsight Free Christian Church, under the conductorship of Mr. Oliver Heys.

After the usual votes of thanks, the Rev. CHARLES ROPEE pronounced the benediction, and the meeting terminated.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

OF the necessity for raising money there is no end, even in connection with churches. I believe there were a few short-sighted Unitarians in this district who thought that the great effort made to raise £10,000 at our Bazaar, held eighteen months ago, was to be followed by a long period of quiescence, during which no special calls would be made upon them by the churches for pecuniary help. Such an expectation was, of course, unreasonable; its realisation would have been a calamity. £10,000 seems a large sum of money to raise all at once for the work of one district; but £20,000 would not enable us to do all the work that is waiting to be done. When by strenuous effort that work is accomplished, it is to be hoped, for the sake of the Gospel we profess, that as much more will present itself to us as being equally urgent, lest we grow self-satisfied and turn to rust. I referred to this in one of my previous letters, in which I announced that certain local bazaars had been held, and that they were attended with success. It is astonishing how restlessness of the right sort is invariably accompanied by resource. Often those who are ill-informed might be excused for thinking that certain of our struggling congregations had exhausted themselves in some recent great effort; but after a short period of quiet working—not real rest—they surprise us by the announcement of another extension, or of a scheme of decoration, the expenses of which they intend to meet by means of a subscription list or a bazaar, or both. In this way our friends at Dob-lane raised £300 a fortnight or so ago, for the purpose of defraying the cost of some very necessary alterations to their buildings. They are not rich people; but they faced their task right cheerfully, and some outside friends were glad of the opportunity of helping them.

Last Saturday I took part in an interesting service at Middleton, when the Rev. C. J. Street was the preacher. It was the occasion of the formal opening of a new organ, built by Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield; which, together with a beautifully carved oak case, cost £600. And the marvel is, it is paid for. As a whole, the Middleton congregation is a poor one; but fortunately it does contain one or two rich and generously disposed folk, who rightly think that religious worship is a thing well worth spending money about; and so big sums and little sums together, plus a donation from the District Association, have been sufficient to cover the cost of what is a remarkably sweet-toned and beautiful instrument.

At Gorton also, building operations have been begun in real earnest. For years past it has been felt by all concerned that the school building was wretchedly inadequate. How all the work has been carried on within its walls so successfully is a marvel. Well, this new school building is to face the main road, alongside the handsome church, and is to be in its own way quite an imposing structure. It is to cost about £5,000; but what with a considerable legacy from the late Alderman Clay, and very generous donations from living friends, and proceeds from bazaars and garden parties, and I know not what, the whole amount is in hand, so that the school will be opened free of debt.

And I have not got half-way through my list yet! I have already previously announced that Swinton has raised £300 to cover its annual chief-rent charge; but it isn't satisfied. It has given notice of a bazaar which is to be held shortly, to raise funds for the carrying out of a scheme which it is convinced will be for the healthier life and more permanent stability of the Church; and as it is most generously encouraged in its undertaking by its richer neighbours at Monton, who can of themselves make any effort of this character a success, there is no manner of doubt as to what the result will be. They will, of course, get the £400 [required].

Longsight is also having a bazaar this present month—vide advertisement in THE INQUIRER. It is anxious to raise the sum of £250 for the decoration and repair of its buildings. What is there more depressing in religious worship than a dirty church, or in a Sunday-school than ugly walls? At any rate, such blemishes are not going to be allowed to exist at Longsight. It is a struggling congregation, which does not find it easy to make both ends meet; but this money must be raised by hook or by crook, and I think that Manchester Unitarians will so support this effort that it will come out all right. Chorlton-cum-Hardy is holding a sale of work in April, with a view to augmenting the fund already in hand for the building of its church. It does not believe there is any economy in half-doing a thing. It has nearly £2,000 in hand, and it wants about £200 more; then it can proceed with the erection of a suitable little school-church, on an eligible site already secured, and thus meet a much felt want in that neighbourhood.

Although I may feel some diffidence in speaking of my own church, I cannot very well omit to mention what is being done at Moss-side. It is just seven years ago since our school building was formally opened, and since then it has been used as both school and church. About six weeks ago I began to canvass my richer members as to what they were prepared to do in order to meet the increasingly full needs of a separate church building. We have already an adjoining plot of ground which we paid for out and out eight years ago. One member promised £4,000 (I exceedingly regret that he died suddenly a fortnight ago, though his gift is assured to us by his will), and the rest of the congregation have determined themselves to raise another £2,000, of which nearly £1,800 is already promised. The plans are in hand, building operations will soon be commenced, and we hope to have our new church opened, quite free from debt, in the autumn of 1900.

Who can say that Manchester Unitarians are asleep or inert? or that they are taking things easy after their great and united effort in 1897? True, I find from the returns sent in by the churches that there is only a very slight increase to record in their aggregate membership; but there must be life and earnestness where work like this is accomplished. Besides, my enumeration is by no means complete. Altrincham has recently bought a plot of ground on which is to be erected a minister's house; the whole scheme is to cost at least £2,000, and that sum will be raised within the church.

Then, again, it is no secret that the friends at Strangeways have long been dissatisfied with the extremely unfavourable position of their church. It is now in the midst of a Jewish colony, and what members it has come from a considerable distance to attend the services. The building to-day is in the wrong place, and everybody knows it; and I understand that the present state of affairs is so unsatisfactory that it cannot be long before a decision must be come to as to whether the congregational life shall be allowed to dwindle away in the present building, or whether they shall boldly follow the population and erect a new church in the direction of Higher Broughton or Cheetham Hill. No doubt, when the step is decided upon, the staunch old friends of Strangeways, men and women, who, in times past were inspired by Dr. Herford's ministry, will generously contribute to the cost of the undertaking, as those who put a high value upon their Unitarianism and its adequate representation.

These are all efforts entirely apart from what we call the Forward Movement; and they surely indicate a measure of vitality which will be gratifying to our Unitarian brethren throughout the country. I may seem to have laid undue stress upon the mere pecuniary aspect of affairs; but, after all, I claim that that is only the manifestation of the deep, unseen realities of spiritual life which cannot be measured or expressed in adequate language.

On the 14th inst. there is to be held in Cross-street Chapel an evening Devotional Service, in which all our churches are to join. The Association is extremely anxious to foster the devotional spirit of its constituent churches, and this united service is hoped to meet a felt and expressed need. The Rev. George Knight, president of the Association, is to conduct the devotional part of the service, while addresses are to be delivered by the Revs. Charles Well-beloved and E. P. Barrow.

The Rev. S. H. Street, of our Renshaw-street Domestic Mission, has made an interesting departure from the ordinary routine of mission work, by opening a coffee tavern in the neighbourhood, with a view to providing counter attractions to the public-house. The initial expenses of furnishing, &c., have been met, and a guarantee fund against possible loss during the first year has been provided by a number of generous friends of the mission, and thus far its success has exceeded all expectations. It is a most interesting experiment, and with your permission I shall be pleased to send you a special letter fully describing it at an early date.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: York-street.—This congregation has lost two valued members within the short space of eight days. Mr. William Gregg was one of the most regular attendants at the Sunday services, and held a seat on the Church Committee, where his refined and wise judgment made itself felt. He was not only greatly respected, but loved by all who knew him. Unassuming in his manner, dignified in his bearing, and genial in his disposition, he had the heart of a child, and was unconventional and unsophisticated. He led a pure and blameless life, and was attentive to his business in which he took great pride, and was known to be a master hand at his craft. He was an omnivorous reader. Nothing of interest to our churches escaped him. John Gault was a great sufferer for many years from chronic asthma, and was unable to attend his church often, but he greatly appreciated the privilege, and also the private ministrations in his sick room. Both of these were suddenly cut down by pneumonia. At their funerals, which were conducted by the Rev. A. Ashworth, a large number of friends testified to the respect in which they were held.

Blackley.—A very successful jumble sale, promoted by the Ladies' Sewing Society, was held on Saturday last. The sale realised over £15, and the amount was handed to the treasurer of the New School Fund.

Blackpool.—On Sunday week the Rev. William Binns gave a lecture on "Emerson," of whom he spoke as "the finest genius produced by the American people, in freshness, freedom, and the straightforward course in which he walked in communion with the Universal Soul." The lecture is well reported in the Blackpool Times of March 4.

Dundee.—At the morning service on Sunday last the Rev. H. Williamson, preaching from the words, "His Lord said unto him, well done, thou good and faithful servant," gave an estimate of the life and character of the late Rev. Robert Spears. He paid a high tribute to his character as a man and as a minister of Christ, and to the wonderful power which is displayed all through his life's work. He said that in the death of Mr. Spears he had lost a true friend, one who was ever ready to offer sympathy and counsel and help when it was needed. He reminded the congregation that it was Mr. Spears, while he was secretary of the B. and F.U.A., who preached at the opening of the church in which it was now assembled, and that since then not a Sunday had passed without regular services being given. In the evening Mr. Williamson gave a lecture on the "Holy Land," being the second of a course to be given in the church under the auspices of the McQuaker trustees for the purpose of drawing the attention of strangers and those who, perhaps, seldom go to any church, but who might be led to attach themselves to a really "Free Church," such as ours is. These lectures are illustrated by magic lantern views, and the attendance has been such as to crowd the church in every part.

Dunmurry.—Preaching on Sunday from Matt. xxv. 23, the Rev. J. A. Kelly made special and appreciative reference to the life and work of the late Mr. Spears. He referred to the high regard in which he was held by so many, but he believed by none more highly than by those connected with the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, the Committee of which, at their meeting last week, had a letter of condolence forwarded to Mrs. Spears.

Framlingham.—One of the most hopeful signs in connection with Unitarianism in Framlingham is the number of young people, who, under the care of Mr. C. P. Dowling, are taking an active part. Death has removed one of them. Ella (age thirteen), eldest daughter of Mr. Dowling, and a girl of much promise, passed to the higher life on Friday, Feb. 24. The funeral took place on the following Tuesday. The service from the Rev. J. P. Hopps' books was read by the Rev. A. Amey, and was followed by a short touching address from Mr. Dowling. Bedford was represented by Miss E. M. Smith.

Heaton Moor.—The annual congregational soirée took place in the Reform Hall, on Monday, Feb. 27, when about 120 friends were present. Mr. Ashworth, the chairman of the congregation, was in the chair, and expressed great pleasure on behalf of the congregation and himself at the presence of the Rev. Priestley Prime, their minister-elect, who was over on a visit. They hoped soon to welcome him as their resident minister. Brief addresses were given by the Revs. W. E. Atack (minister-in-charge, pro tem.), B. C. Constable, and Priestley Prime. The musical programme was then given, and much appreciated. There was a distinctly hopeful tone throughout the whole proceedings, which should augur well for the future. Mr. Prime will take up his duties here on April 16 next.

Idle.—The congregation at Highfield-road have to mourn the loss through death of an old and faithful member, connected with the chapel since its opening. Mrs. Mary Ann Garnett was seventy-two years of age, and was actively at work to within two days of her death. The funeral, which took place at the Parish churchyard, was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Eastlake. It was attended by a large number of friends and temperance workers, the whole family of the deceased being teetotallers. On Sunday evening Mr. Eastlake preached a funeral sermon.

Kilmalcolm, Scotland.—A lecture was delivered by the Rev. A. C. Henderson, of Paisley, on March 2, on "The Worlds around us; their habitability and testimony to the existence of God." The lecturer took his audience on an imaginary tour amongst the various bodies of the solar system, beginning with the Sun and ending with Neptune. The lecture was profusely illustrated by large coloured diagrams and limelight views, and was much appreciated by a large audience.

Lewisham.—In response to many inquiries, it is proposed to form a cycling club in connection with this church, thereby continuing during the summer months the weekly reunions in a seasonable and agreeable way, which the literary and scientific society encourage during the winter. The club will ask for support from members of the congregation and their friends who are interested in cycling, and will arrange a series of trips to the many picturesque and interesting places in our vicinity. A meeting will be called at an early date to arrange the necessary details and to appoint officers; but in the meantime those who are wishful to join will much oblige by sending their names to the temporary hon. secretary, Mr. Edward McKenzie, 10, Rushey-green, Catford, S.E.

Liscard.—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas is delivering a course of Sunday evening lectures dealing with the present crisis in the Church of England and sacerdotalism in religion. At the first lecture last Sunday evening there was an attendance of 140. The new church buildings are making capital progress, the roof being already tiled.

London: Hampstead (Appointment).—At the annual meeting of the Rosslyn-hill congregation on Wednesday evening last the appointment of the Rev. Edgar Daplyn as assistant minister to Dr. Herford was cordially approved. Mr. Daplyn will preach at Rosslyn-hill Chapel on Sunday next, morning and evening, though he will not enter on his new engagement till Midsummer.

London: Stepney Green.—The congregation of College Chapel owes its origin to the late Rev. Robert Spears, and references were made at each of the services last Sunday to his death and memory. Mr. Tavener was the preacher morning and evening. The usual monthly Postal Mission Conference was held last Sunday, when Dr. Herbert Smith opened the proceedings with a paper on "How to read the Bible." It was followed by short speeches from Miss Teschemacher, Miss F. Hill, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Dancy, Mr. Hall, and Mr. Tavener.

Moir.—Mr. W. J. Agnew, hon. treasurer of this congregation, has been elected District Councillor without opposition.

Moneyrea.—On Saturday evening there was a private meeting of the United Temperance Guild, when nineteen adults signed the pledge and were enrolled. At the three meetings held during 1899, seventy adults have taken the pledge. Arrangements for advancing still further the cause in the district were made, and suitable addresses were delivered by the Rev. R. Lytle and Mr. A. K. Stewart. The pulpit and choir of Moneyrea Meeting House have been re-upholstered and furnished, the work being tastefully carried out by the members of the choir.

Newcastle-on-Tyne: Church of the Divine Unity.—At a meeting of the congregation, held on Sunday morning, March 5, the following resolution was submitted by the Rev. Frank Walters, and supported by Councillor Robert Affleck, J.P., secretary, the members giving assent by rising in their places:—"That we express our deep regret at the death of the Rev. Robert Spears, and record our gratitude for his long life of indefatigable service in the cause of Unitarian Christianity. As preacher, writer, and publisher of our literature, and, especially in the issue of a popular edition of Dr. Channing's works, he helped to promote the spiritual faith for which our churches stand. To his sorrowing widow we extend our respectful sympathy."

Newton Abbot.—On Sunday week the service in the Public Rooms was conducted by the Rev. C. A. Greaves, who took as the subject of his sermon, "What think thee of Christ?" Last Sunday Miss E. Stewart, of Exeter, preached on the subject of "The Doctrine of Immortality." The attendance was good.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—At a meeting of the Committee held in the library of the Church of the Divine Unity on Monday evening a resolution of sympathy and condolence was passed to the widow and family of the late Rev. Robert Spears, of London. Reference was made by the movers to the connection which had existed between the Association and Mr. Spears, the first services conducted by him as a Unitarian preacher being at a little mission room at Eighton Banks, and, lately, at Barnard Castle, the services at the church there have been carried on largely under his direction. The hope was expressed that there never will be wanting in the body earnest men to follow the noble, self-sacrificing and zealous example of Robert Spears.

Rotherham.—On Monday evening, Feb. 27, the Rev. W. Stephens lectured on Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar" to the Rotherham Congregational Literary and Musical Society. The Rev. J. F. Parmiter presided, and a cordial vote of thanks to the lecturer was passed. On the following evening the annual business meeting of the congregation of the Church of our Father was held, Mr. Stephens in the chair, when a satisfactory report was presented.

Saffron Walden.—On the 5th inst. the congregation of the General Baptist Chapel assembled at the close of morning service, by resolution, desired their pastor to express by letter their deepest sympathy with Mrs. Spears and family in the great loss they have sustained by the decease of the Rev. Robert Spears. On various occasions during the past twenty-four years he has rendered very helpful services to this church. In him they had a friend to whom they could refer at all times, the re-opening services which he conducted after the renovations in 1890, and the sermon he then delivered from the words, "The joy of the Lord is your strength," will never be forgotten by some of those who heard it. We deeply mourn his loss to our churches. The evening service was devoted to an "In Memoriam" to the memory of the late Rev. Robert Spears, the endeared friend of the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth during the past thirty-five years. Various incidents that had occurred during this period were mentioned, and he for one, among many others, was conscious of a loss that would not again be filled on earth.

Shrewsbury.—At the morning service on Sunday the Rev. James C. Street referred in touching and sympathetic words to the death of his old friend and co-worker, the Rev. Robert Spears. The sermon was based upon the words of James, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him," and also the words of John to the Church at Smyrna, "Be thou faithful until death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Mr. Street pointed out that Mr. Spears, like himself, had been brought up as a Methodist, and said no doubt much of the fervour and earnestness which he put into his work was the result of his early connection with that body—was, in fact, due to the consecration of Methodism. But the fact of Mr. Spears coming under the influence of such a man as the Rev. Geo. Harris—one of his (Mr. Street's) predecessors at Newcastle-on-Tyne—just at the time when his views were changing, and he was emerging from Orthodoxy, had much to do with shaping Mr. Spears's theological position. Mr. Harris belonged to what is generally known as the old school of theologians—an honoured school, containing names it was a great privilege to utter as well as to be associated with—in our Free Churches, believing in the supernatural elements of Christianity and the Miracles, and no doubt Mr. Spears imbibed his religious or theological ideas eagerly from this teaching. But whilst Harris, Aspland, and others of this old school acknowledged that they had attained their position through the freedom of our churches, and would do nothing to hinder others from a similar growth in the future, Mr. Spears was never quite able to take this step. Whilst all admired the splendid missionary spirit which he displayed, and the earnestness that characterised all his work, one could not but regret that he was unable to free himself entirely of the old spirit that would tie men down and prevent them from being absolutely free. He had passed on—his life had not ended—and had received the "Well done, good and faithful servant." There was much cause for thankfulness in his life here of more than three score years and ten; he was a warm-hearted, sympathetic friend, to whom any might go—even the most advanced—feeling sure of his sympathy and help. He was one of the best known of our ministers, not only in London, but in the United Kingdom. He re-created the B. and F.U.A., and perhaps the greatest work he did in connection with that Association was the circulation of Channing's works. He (Mr. Street) had had many controversies with him, sometimes differing very widely from him; yet he freely acknowledged his singleness of purpose, his fidelity to conscience, and his faithfulness to the principles he had espoused, and he prayed God that they might all win the "Well done" which Robert Spears had now received from the Father of us all.

Sunderland.—On Sunday evening, March 5, Mr. Stirling gave a very able discourse on "The Apostle, an Agent of Civilisation," and before commencing his sermon referred to the death of the Rev. R. Spears, who, many years ago, had charge of the congregation at Sunderland. After giving a short sketch of Mr. Spears' career, Mr. Stirling asked those present to join, for a few moments, in silent meditation, as a mark of respect to the memory of Mr. Spears.

York.—At a meeting of the congregation of the St. Saviourgate Chapel, on Feb. 26, Mr. J. W. Beal, of 4, Abbey-street, Clifton, was appointed secretary in the place of Mr. James Brown, who resigned through ill-health.

UNITY CHURCH, DEWSBURY.

A GRAND BAZAAR will be held on SATURDAY, MONDAY, and TUESDAY, April 29th, May 1st and 2nd, 1899.

During the past forty years this Congregation has been assisted by the Yorkshire Unitarian Union with an annual grant of about £70. Conscious of the diminished resources of the Union Committee, we ventured (in view of the largely-increased congregations under Mr. Boughey's ministry) to endeavour to carry on the cause at Dewsbury as an Independent Church.

Unity Church has always been dependent upon a periodic Bazaar, and it has again to appeal for aid in this form; but as a sum of money will soon have to be spent on the buildings, and the purpose is to raise an Emergency Fund to put the independence on a firm basis, it appeals to its friends and the public with more than usual confidence, trusting to the general willingness to help the self-helping.

The Committee of the Union has responded to our Resolution conveying the above intention with the following vote:—

"The Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union congratulate the Dewsbury congregation on their endeavour to secure the independence of the church, and commend their forthcoming Bazaar to the generous support of the Unitarian public."

Contributions in money or goods will be gratefully received by

Rev. J. BOUGHEY, President, Hope-street, Dewsbury.
HENRY DEARDEN, Treasurer, Alexandra-crescent, Dewsbury.
THOMAS SYKES, 36, Ashworth-road, Dewsbury, and G. H. SYKES, Nook, Earlsheaton, Dewsbury, Secretaries.
Mrs. W. WALKER, High Close, 26, Oxford-road, Dewsbury.
Mrs. R. THORNTON, Eightlands Cottage, Dewsbury.
Mrs. T. RICHARDS, Alfred House, Westtown, Dewsbury.
Miss HOWE, Prospect House, Dewsbury.
Miss HAIGH, 23 and 24, Grand Arcade, Leeds.
JOSEPH MAX, David-lane, Batley Carr, Dewsbury

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood, which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer of the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq. (President of the Provincial Assembly of London and S. E. Counties), Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE National Council of Evangelical Free Churches held its annual meetings in Liverpool this week. The sermon of Dr. Clifford, the retiring president, which appears in this week's Christian World, dealt vigorously with the present crisis in the Church. The new president, Dr. Mackennal, of Bowdon, hitherto hon. secretary of the Council, in his address gave an account of the steady progress of the movement. Towards the conclusion he spoke of the great value of united missions, and said: "The real work of the Council was the work which waited to be done in 'dark unlovely streets,' in quiet country places where the life of men was not beautiful, in the homes of the neglected, among the children of the poor."

At a subsequent session of the Council the following resolution was passed :—

1. That the National Council, whilst rejoicing in the signs of quickened spiritual life in the National Church, deeply deplores the widespread adoption and inculcation of ideas and practices by large and increasing numbers of the clergy concerning religion, the Church, the priesthood, the mass, and the confessional.

2. The Council protests against the defiant, persistent, and unscrupulous determination of such clergy to undo the work of the Reformation, as a flagrant wrong in itself, wholly inconsistent with the letter and with the spirit of their contract with the State and entirely inimical to the moral well-being of the nation.

3. And earnestly urges Parliament to do its utmost to maintain its own authority and to safeguard the Protestantism of the realm.

4. Seeing the difficulty the State has in controlling the clergy of the Established Church, the Council is convinced that there is no final and effective method of terminating the spread of Romanism within the Anglican Church except that of dissolving the existing connection between the Church and the State, thus setting the Church free for the management of its own affairs and delivering the State from the burden of duties it cannot adequately discharge. And therefore—

5. The National Council appeals not only to its own members throughout the country and to all citizens, but also to the Evangelical party of the Anglican Church to support a policy of justice and freedom in the interest of real religion, sound Protestantism, good government, and the well-being of the nation.

A warm tribute was paid to the memory of the late Dr. Charles Berry, of Wolverhampton, the first president of the Council, and a resolution in support of the proposals of the Tsar's Rescript was also passed, as from "about seven millions of Evangelical Nonconformists of England."

IN Tuesday's Liverpool Daily Post appeared a letter from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, "A Greeting to the Free Church Federation, by one of the Excluded." Having referred to the remarkable progress made by the Federation, which yet in his opinion might have been a very much grander and nobler thing, and having spoken of the gratification it was to see the various sects at last agreeing together, and able to worship and work together for the Kingdom of God, Mr. Armstrong continued :—

"Yet, while sincerely and cordially welcoming these brethren and wishing them god-speed, the occasion seems opportune for a word of friendly remonstrance with them on their theological exclusiveness. Much of the work in which they are engaged is work in which, on other platforms, the Unitarians and they have stood side by side, and it is, at least on the face of it, a pity that friends and sympathisers in a common cause should be so rigidly ruled out of communion. A few years ago the battle was fought. Mr. Stead courageously and passionately fought for the inclusion of the Unitarians. The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, perhaps by temperament the most sacerdotally-minded man in England, fought on the other side. The scene has been described to me by the distinguished minister who occupied the chair. Mr. Stead was beaten, and the dogmatic basis was adopted. Where local councils had already been formed, including Unitarians, they were for the most part dissolved or purged. Here and there, as notably at Burnley, the true Nonconformist spirit proved too sturdy for the purge, and to this day the Unitarians are retained as equal members. But such local councils have been rigidly barred out from the National Federation.

"I freely admit that open Unitarians are few. Nor is it for me to say that they would have added any great strength to the movement. But it is the point of principle that one deplores. It is always grievous when a movement that looks like broadening the bounds of freedom and realising the brotherhood of men of different faiths shrivels up into one more sectarian organisation, tying itself down to a dogmatic basis."

THE Rev. Thomas Law, organising secretary of the Federation, had declared, said Mr. Armstrong, that "all the strong men of Nonconformity" would be in Liverpool that week; and pointedly he adds :—"James Martineau, Stopford Brooke, Brooke Herford, Page Hopps will not only not be here, but would be denied recognition if they came, yet one has not been accustomed to account them weaklings."

TURNING next to the Catechism lately issued by a committee of the Federation, Mr. Armstrong contrasts the simple religious statements with which it opens with the later Trinitarian passages. Of the former he says :—

"Why, sir, this is a new thing in Catechisms. Here is indeed an accurate and comprehensive statement of the teaching of Jesus Christ. It is to teach this and the whole of this, as the very central truth of God, that Unitarian Christians from Channing to the preachers of to-day have given all the energies of life.

"But I begin to perceive where the difficulty comes in when I turn to later passages in the Catechism judiciously separated by some pages from this plain statement of the full and beautiful religion of Jesus. Here the name declared by Jesus is put aside in favour of the statement that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are one God, and the Fatherly love so glowingly described at the outset is so far modified as to be said to require 'an Advocate with the Father' to make continuous 'intercession' for us, before the Father's love can do us any good. In fact this part of the Catechism is charged with a strain of thought wholly alien, as it would seem, to that which stands in the forefront, and drawn from totally different sources. And no doubt it is because the Unitarian cannot, with the Catechists, thus at the same time hold two religions, that he is thought an unsuitable person to be federated with them."

THE two kinds of statement in the Catechism, Mr. Armstrong refers to the two main streams of Christian thought and feeling running down the centuries, the one drawn from the simpler portions of the Gospels, from the teaching of Jesus himself, the other from St. Paul, and then from the great fighting theologians of the Church in later times. The one may be called Christian Theism, the other Orthodoxy, whether Catholic or Protestant in its various forms. And the letter concludes:—

"But the two religions, 'Christian Theism' and dogmatic 'Orthodoxy,' will not mix. They are logically incompatible each with the other. A man must choose which master he will serve. This Catechism tries to include them both. One of the most splendid men of modern Nonconformity, Dr. John Clifford, says that this Catechism registers the state of theological thought at the end of the nineteenth century. He had better have given it any praise than that. 'Thought,' 'thinking,' means the intellectual co-ordination of various conceptions, the establishment of harmony between propositions. This Catechism is a catalogue of theological ideas. But not an attempt is made at their co-ordination. They are left side by side in their naked incompatibility. Let us pray that the fittest may survive!"

COMMENTING on Mr. Armstrong's letter, the Christian World says:—

"The visit of the Free Church Federation to Liverpool has called forth from the minister of a Unitarian church there, Rev. R. A. Armstrong, a characteristic letter of greeting and of remonstrance. He joins heartily in their welcome to Liverpool, but laments that the Federation should have shut out Unitarians from its fellowship. We regret it too, though fully recognising the grounds of this action. The new organism has developed naturally. It has followed the line of least resistance. It could hardly be expected to do everything at once. But we are equally certain that when the Federation has become more assured of itself, and more fully acclimatised to the air of liberty, it will cease to fear the still wider communion which Mr. Armstrong desires. If Unitarian brethren wish to share the enthusiasm, the warmth of conviction and of expression, of the Evangelical bodies, what harm, what in fact but good can come from admitting them to it? It would be, of course, on the understanding of not surrendering one jot of faith, or of the fraction of a single degree of fervour. The pure Christian spirit goes out in sympathy to every good and earnest man. The principle of exclusion is a theological one, but it is not a Christian one. If the Unitarians found themselves not at home in the Evangelical atmosphere they would be, of course, free to leave it. But it is not a Christian act to shut them out. The Federation might, indeed, on this matter very profitably debate the question, 'What would Jesus do?'"

It is to be hoped that no Protestant religious paper will avow any sympathy with "The Confessions of a Confessor," now being published in the Leeds Mercury. These articles are evidently intended to catch the multitude. But they contain no very startling revelations of High Church practices. We all know that many of the Anglican clergy encourage auricular confession, and many more affect Roman ritual, and nothing beyond this is to be learned from these papers. What distinguishes them is the shameless avowal by their author of the treachery and direct untruth by means of which he gained his information. "As to his methods," says the editor, "it scarcely lies with the Ritualist party to condemn them. Our correspondent has only taken a leaf out of their own book." Be that as it may, we trust that the Protestant party will repudiate all complicity with methods so openly immoral.

"MAKE yourself clear that you are justified in deception, and then lie like a trooper." The editor of the Leeds Mercury calls this saying, attributed to W. G. Ward, a "remarkable dictum," and admits that it has been acted upon by "our correspondent." It is astonishing how frequently, and with what lack of humour, this apophthegm is quoted on Protestant platforms. The gist of it lies in the first clause; but it is hard to believe that even the most bigoted partisan can justify such deception as is here confessed. The writer has, in fact, played the part of a detective or a spy, assuming a false character in order to betray his victims into indiscreet confidence, which he proceeds to violate in public print. Unless we call our High Church brethren criminals or foes there can be no appropriateness, even, in such a way of dealing with them; and even then the methods remain dishonourable and unclean. What reliance, again, can be placed on the evidence of an anonymous writer who begins by confessing to systematic falsehood? To support a holy cause with unholy weapons is to betray it.

A SEVEN years' uphill fight for unsectarian education in the village of Burton Latimer was crowned last Saturday by the formal opening of the new undenominational schools, which have been in use since the beginning of the year. The opening ceremony was performed by the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, vice-chairman of the London School Board.

A BITTER little controversy has lately been raging in the beautiful Yorkshire village of South Cave, between an autocratic vicar and the great majority of his parishioners, concerning the management of the sectarian school. All manner of charges and counter-charges have been advanced, into which the outside public have no temptation to enter; but two incidents of wider interest, as throwing light upon the dangers of private school management, have emerged. The two churchwardens, who sat on the board of management ex-officio, went into opposition to the vicar, who thereupon discovered that their presence on the board was a mistake, and successfully proposed a resolution to expel them. The legality of this proceeding was naturally called in question, whereupon the vicar obtained and published what he called "Counsel's Opinion"—a document drawn up and signed in due form, and naturally laying down the law in his favour. Some time later it was discovered that the name subscribed was not that of a barrister at all, but of a clergyman officially connected with the National Society. More recently the vicar, supported by a majority of the emasculated board, dismissed without even the allegation of justice a master and mistress who had been teaching in the school for thirty years. The great body of the parishioners, helped by the N.U.T., forthwith opened an undenominational school with these two teachers in charge. It began on the day after the dismissal took effect, with this result: four children attended the church school, ninety-eight attended the new undenominational school.

THE University Congregational Church of Chicago, says the Christian World, has adopted the following as its new bond of union, unanimously endorsed by the membership:—

We, the undersigned, are associated together for the worship of God, instruction in religion, mutual helpfulness in the spiritual life and for service to our fellow-men.

We believe the two laws of love toward God and love toward our neighbour, to be the fundamental and all inclusive ideal of every true life.

In subscribing ourselves members of the University Congregational Church we declare it our purpose to strive to make the spirit of Christ dominant in our lives and in all the relations of men to each other.

And our contemporary adds, in words which we most cordially endorse:—"Nothing, surely, could be simpler; yet what more is needed? The Chicago University Congregational Church has here a programme which will take more than the lifetime of any church to fill up, and which, honestly carried out, will keep every member on the full stretch for all he can receive of God and give to his fellow-men. It is the union of the primitive Church—a union that is based on the love of God and the desire for the fulness of the Spirit of Christ."

ANOTHER SECESSION FROM THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—The Rev. Charles Edward Oliver, B.A., has resigned his work as a clergyman in the Church of England, and desires to join the ranks of the Unitarians. He was educated at St. Edward's School, Oxford, and Selwyn College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1887. He was ordained deacon in 1888, and priest in 1889 by the Bishop of Lichfield. He has been curate at Hadleigh, Suffolk, for the last four and a-half years. For several years he has had strong sympathy with the Unitarian movement, and in consequence great difficulty in remaining in the Church of England. He found his position no longer compatible with a free and honest religious life, and so he wrote to his Bishop informing him of his desire to enter the Unitarian ministry. The Advisory Committee have examined Mr. Oliver's credentials and references and they have certified to his character and personal fitness. Communications for Mr. Oliver should be addressed care of the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall, from whom the secretary of any congregation may obtain full particulars and copies of testimonials.

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled —"JAMES EPPS and Co. Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London."

ARNOBIUS.—II.

THERE are but two manuscripts of Arnobius extant, and one of these is a transcript of the other. Of the older manuscript the title page is lost, and it is not quite certain whether the title was "Adversus Gentes" or "Adversus Nationes." But it was against the heathen in any case. In some respects this title sufficiently explains the object of the work. So far as it was addressed to the heathen, who were perfectly satisfied with their religion; who believed that the gods could be angry and unjust, and capable of every vice which man has conceived or practised; who delighted in reading the literature in which the adventures of the gods were narrated, and in seeing gross representations of these things upon the stage; and who were not slow to imitate the example set by the gods at the cost of social purity—the discourse of Arnobius is correctly described as against the Gentiles. He taunts them with his ridicule, he withers them with his scorn, he overwhelms them with his denunciation. As we read we can almost fancy that we hear him speaking, for surely the contents of his book were orations spoken with the ardour of the practised advocate, not written with the calm of the unemotional philosopher. But we should get a wrong impression of the object of Arnobius if we confined ourselves to this conception. He makes a very especial appeal to those who were not satisfied with the popular religions; to those who had come to believe in the existence of one Supreme God; to those who attempted to represent the gods as unworthy of the adoration of good and pious men. Professing the utmost sympathy with their attitude, so far as theory is concerned, he protests against the practical indifference which they exhibit; he declares that they have done nothing to suppress the corruptions of which they themselves are fully conscious. But, alas! the process of elevating religion is a difficult one, the popular conceptions of a more barbaric age continue to exist for a long time. The ignorant and the thoughtless cling to the old ideas. Old prejudices and vested interests resist the attempt to purify religious ideas. This was the case with the Polytheism of the Roman world and it is by the light of this fact that the arguments of Arnobius must be read.

In making this appeal, Arnobius first pleads for the toleration of Christians. The work commences with a refutation of the opinion, that all the evils which had occurred for the previous 300 years had been occasioned by the anger of the gods excited by the introduction of Christianity. This was no mere abstract discussion of a scholastic character. Ignorant prejudice was ready to believe the doctrine, and it tended to stimulate persecutions against the Christians. But the enlightened heathen ought to know better. And yet within the memory of men yet living, it was supposed by some the potato blight was caused by the Maynooth grant, while others attributed the cattle plague to the neglect of the observance of Lent. If man would not voluntarily abstain from animal food, God would take care that he should be compelled to do; while one eminent Bishop, according to a doggerel of the time,

Knew full well, and told all men so,
The plague was brought by Bishop Colenso.

The statement that all the evils which had occurred in the world for the last 300 years had been caused by the introduction of Christianity is confronted by Arnobius with facts in a most scientific fashion. He first asserts that the nature of things, or, as we should say, the order of Nature, has remained essentially unchanged. "The revolution of the globe" proceeds at the same rate. The stars rise and set as of old. The same sun shines, the moon still shapes herself anew. The cold of winter and the heat of summer are the same. The seed sprouts and the trees are clothed with leaves as of old. Then he proceeds to show that the evils which have existed after the advent of Christ existed before, because when they first occurred within the Christian era, people had no difficulty in giving each one its proper name; and this shows that the evil had already been named, and therefore known. And the slightest reference to history would show that it was so.

But not only had the same evils occurred, there had been greater ones. Referring to heathen myths, he says:—"When was the human race destroyed by a flood? Was it not before us? When was the world set on fire? Was it not before us?" (I. c. 3.) With regard to the evils which had occurred within the Christian era, Arnobius asks whether they were sent to punish the Christians? If that were so, then the Persians suffered defeat, because there were Christians on their side. But if this was the true explanation, how was it that the Romans were victorious, who had Christians on their side also? The fact was, however, that both heathens and Christians suffered—that is, the worshippers of the gods suffered as well as those who refused to do them homage. Was that just? Perhaps it will be argued that the gods punished the heathen in order to excite them to punish the Christians? But why should not the gods punish the Christians without such mediation and leave the innocent heathen alone? Is the help of man necessary to enable the gods to inflict punishment on the guilty? Surely not. Then he proposes a test. Let the heathen pray that the gods should send all possible evils on the Christians—all possible blessings on the heathen. But he is quite confident that as they have not done this in the past, they will not do it in the present.

This appeal to the facts of the case is supplemented by the argument, that the gods, according to the view of enlightened heathens, are incapable of anger; and that, if the immortal gods were angry, it would be fatal to their immortality. But assuming for the sake of argument that the immortal gods were capable of anger, while in all other respects they were worthy of the adoration of an enlightened piety, Arnobius shows that the Christians had done nothing to excite the wrath of such beings; while, on the other hand, their anger must have been excited by their own devotees—the historians who have recorded the most shameful stories; the poets who have made those stories more attractive by their poetic art; by the philosophers who have explained away certain deities into non-existence; by the priests under whose influence temples have been built, idols worshipped and sacrifices offered, all which things are shown to be unworthy of the true gods. Arnobius protests against the idea that the evil effect of the stories told about the gods can be met by allegorical interpretation. To describe the phenomena of Nature, or to enforce some moral precept, under the guise of an impure story about the gods, invented for the occasion, would not be edifying to men and would be no better than a libel upon the gods, even if it were certain (which it is not) that these stories were intended to be interpreted allegorically.

But Arnobius pleads for something more than the mere toleration of Christianity. He shows that Christians and enlightened heathens have one religion common to both. Both believe in the existence of one Supreme God, the First Cause (I. c. 31). This belief is common to all because it is an innate conviction in the soul of every man born into the world. But if this is so, "it follows as a consequence that all those whom the imagination of man believes to be gods must be begotten of Him or produced at His bidding" (II. c. 35). If they are immortal, their immortality is the gift of the Supreme God. "All the gods are immortal and everlasting by His goodwill and free gift" (II. c. 62). But they must be like the Supreme God to deserve this title (VII. c. 2). He speaks of "the gods who most assuredly exist if only there are any who are worthy to bear and to hold that most exalted title" (IV. c. 11). That is to say, he is ready to grant the existence of such beings on the assumption that they do nothing unworthy of their high position. He claims that Christ is entitled to be ranked in this august assembly; and then he shows how utterly unworthy the actual gods of heathenism are. And thus arguing with them from their own point of view, Christ is left the sole secondary God, acting as the mouth-piece or representative of the Supreme God.

It is impossible within the limits of this paper to follow the arguments in detail. I must content myself with dwelling on one or two points. Arnobius, before his conversion, was a famous rhetorician and teacher of rhetoric, and throughout this work he exhibits the art of the practised debater. He shows the unreasonableness of a given opinion, but, not content with that, he assumes for the sake of argument that it is true, and then shows to what absurdities the principle would lead. He considers carefully all the objections that might be brought against his statements. He never attempts to prove more than his argument requires. He confesses that there are many things which he cannot explain. And if it is replied that he ought to know, he retorts upon his opponents that there are many things about which they are also probably ignorant. When he has argued how a thing cannot be done, he does not hold that he is bound also to declare how it has been done. There is one little art of rhetoric which pleases me immensely. Instead of abusing his opponents, he stops short with an "Oh you——!" This may mean, Now I put it to you, whether this is not so; or it may mean that his self-respect and gentlemanly feeling make him refrain from saying what he thinks of his opponents. He leaves it to the imagination of an antagonist to fill in the blank. Nay, it may even suggest that the speaker cannot find words to express the stupidity of the advocate on the other side. This mode of speech is safe, for it cannot be taken to be libellous; it is infinitely suggestive; it is expressive through the very arrest of expression.

Sometimes he displays no little humour in stating a strong argument. On the assumption that sacrifices are pleasing to the gods, he asks, How do we know that what pleases us will please them? Suppose, he says in effect, that certain animals mistook you for a god, and offered you the food on which they live, would that be pleasing to you? If swallows consecrated to you the flies which they kill, and the water-wagtails offered you the ants on which they feed, if asses put hay upon your tables and offered a libation of chaff, if dogs brought you bones, and, last but not least, if pigs poured out before you a horrid mess taken from their swill-tubs—would you feel honoured by such treatment? (VII. c. 28).

The passages in which Arnobius denounces the vile immorality associated with heathenism are not very edifying reading. But they are necessary to his argument. And we must remember that the things he speaks of were not simply to be found by students in reference libraries not easily accessible to the public, but that probably there was an enormous literature of a kind which we should at once suppress to-day. It must be remembered that the vices of the gods were not only to be found recorded in books, but were reproduced on the stage. How could even the most moral escape the taint of this corruption? "What man is there that has been reared with morals so pure that the example of the gods does not excite to similar madness? (V. c. 25). He puts it to his opponents how they would like to have their nearest relatives imitating the vices of the gods whom they worship? On the ground of social purity, if not of religion, they ought to join with Arnobius in his crusade against this monstrous evil.

Arnobius lived in Sicca Veneria towards the close of the third century and the beginning of the fourth. Place and time are very significant. Sicca Veneria, a town in Proconsular Africa, was the seat of the worship of the old Phœnician deities, and especially of the lascivious rites associated with the Syrian Astarte—a fitting place for one who wrote against the corruption of the heathen religion. We are not certain as to the exact date at which Arnobius wrote. The different statements on this subject may arise from the fact that different portions of the work were written or spoken at different times, and were ultimately published towards the end of the writer's life, or possibly after his death; for it is supposed that the work had not the benefit of his final revision. In any case the dates are significant. A portion of the work pleading for toleration was written either in 297 or 303. If in 297 that would be a year after the publication of the edict of Diocletian against the Manicheans in Africa; and if in 303, in the very year that the last general persecution of the Christians commenced. The argument that no Christian would plead for toleration at the time when persecution was rife, seems to me very like asserting that fire-engines should be used to water streets, but should be carefully kept away from burning houses. If Arnobius published his work in 326, that would be thirteen years after Constantine had taken the Christian religion under his patronage. That the portion of the work in which he tries to convert his hearers or readers to Christianity was written as late as this, seems to be pretty plain from the fact that Arnobius represents his opponents as saying that Christianity had not existed for 400 years; an expression which is more suitable to the year 326 than to 297 or 303. The argument from the great age of Arnobius, if the book were produced so late as 326, does not seem to me very strong. A good friend of mine is now, at the ripe age of eighty-six, writing an autobiography, which is being printed in a Scotch newspaper.

Arguments are not, alas! always effective in proportion to their logical cogency. Still it may be well believed that this appeal was not without effect upon the philosophical heathen. It recognised, and co-operated with, the attempt to elevate the heathen religion; and if the argument tended to the establishment of Christianity in the place of heathenism, the result was a deduction from the principles of the philosophers themselves. But the appeal of Arnobius to philosophers brought a new element into philosophy, the idea of a divine revelation of the truth. In one place he speaks of "the immortality in which you believe, relying on the assertions of a few men" (I. c. 6). On the contrary, he believed in the revelation of the conditions of human immortality proclaimed by Christ as the mouthpiece of the Supreme God. He gives no proof of the reliability of such a revelation. He asserts it. And it seems to be reasonable that one who believes in a Supreme Being not because he can prove the doctrine but because he has an overwhelming innate conviction of its truth, may just as well have an innate conviction that such a Supreme God, if he exists, must necessarily vouchsafe a much needed revelation.

Another element in the appeal of Arnobius which must have been most successful was the contrast between Christ and the gods of the popular theology. The latter were unblushingly represented as the perpetrators of every vice. The Christ appeared in human form to deliver a divine message, to feed the souls of men with divine truth, to cure the bodies of men by the means of beneficent miracles. Is it possible to conceive of a more complete contrast? The appeal is founded on the authority of Christ as messenger of God. There is no reference to the Old Testament. The New Testament is not quoted in innumerable places where its words would have confirmed the argument used. But probably the Old and New Testament were but a barbarian literature in the eyes of the philosophers appealed to; while they would protest against the idea of first becoming Jews in order to be converted to Christianity. It is not altogether unreasonable to hope, therefore, that this appeal to the enlightened heathen was not made without success. It may have moderated the prejudice of ignorance and stayed the severity of persecution; it may have won over some of those heathen philosophers to whom the appeal is especially made; and it may have afforded those who conformed to Christianity when it was supported by imperial favour, some better reason for their change than that of adopting a religion because it had become the religion of the Court.

In a concluding paper I propose to deal with the doctrinal views which Arnobius incidentally expresses in the course of his argument. CHARLES C. COE.

LITERATURE.

A MODERN INDIAN SAINT.*—II.

RÂMKRISHNA had, as we have seen, the two primary qualifications for Vedântic culture—namely, an intense desire for salvation, and a living faith. These were his natural endowments. He had also what, for want of a better term, may be called an intensely psychic temperament. He had an extraordinarily powerful representative imagination, which the slightest suggestion could work up to an immense extent. This explains his trances and visions. Trances and visions are not peculiar to the Hindu saint. We have records of them in both Christian and Moslem literature. Râmkrishna saw Kâli in his trances, because the suggestion was there in his individual training and in the tradition of his sect and his country. The Catholic saints saw Jesus, and the Sufi devotee saw Mahomet or Ali, under exactly the same psychic conditions, but with different suggestions. The truth of Râmkrishna's visions need not be denied, any more than that of the visions of the Catholic or the Mahomedan saints. But the truth of the vision does not necessarily prove the reality of the object seen. These visions, however, are not essential to spiritual culture. They are not to be sought for. Their only value, even in the opinion of Indian saints, consists in the evidence they afford that the seer of them is a favourable subject for the discipline of Yoga. These visions did not satisfy Râmkrishna himself, for it is evident that all his struggles really came after, and not before, his earlier visions. It was then that his fighting and fasting commenced. And what struggles he had to conquer himself! He fought with his desires, his appetites, his lower self day and night. There was nothing that he shrank from, nothing that he would not give up, nothing that he would not undergo, to conquer himself. To kill his innate conceit of caste, Râmkrishna undertook with his own hands the most menial service, and by discipline no less thorough and persistent he overcame his love of money and the desires of the flesh. That the fight was long, the struggle was hard, we need not question. There are ample evidences of this in the book before us. Nor does the fact that Râmkrishna had to fight so hard and long to conquer himself in any way take away from his greatness. That he could fight in this fashion is in itself, rather, the highest proof of that greatness. Through these disciplines Râmkrishna purified himself and rose to that union with Brahman which is the ideal of every Hindu saint, to whatever sect he may belong. There are two ways of approaching this ideal, one of these is to commence with the study of the Vedânta, get first intellectually established in the truth, and then realise it, through the needed disciplines; the other is to purify the heart through the disciplines first and then rise intellectually also to the truth. Râmkrishna followed the second and rougher, though surer path, but reached the same goal.

* "Râmkrishna: His Life and Sayings." By the Right Hon. F. Max Müller, K.M. Longmans, Green and Co. 1898. 5s.

But one of the most prominent characteristic of Rāmkrishna was what may be called his universalism. It is this, perhaps, more than anything else, that drew educated men to him, and this seems to be the main cause of whatever success the missionary efforts of his disciples have gained in Western countries. This universalism is not new in India. It is as old, at least, as the Bhagabad-gītā. With the followers of Rāmkrishna it has found expression in the statement that all religions are true. It is illustrated in the story found among Rāmkrishna's sayings, describing how a company of blind men gained their knowledge of an elephant. It is an ancient story, well known to all Indian logicians, and illustrates the doctrine of the relativity of human knowledge. But the underlying assumption of the story is not quite consistent, I am afraid, with Vedāntic teachings, which, while accepting the relativity of knowledge in the field of the phenomenal, or Byabā hārika existence, boldly asserts the absolute character of our knowledge of Brahman, which is essentially the same as our own self. The doctrine that all religions are equally true admits of only one Vedāntic interpretation—namely, that all are equally false, being objects of nescience—abidyabad bishayani. But without entering into this matter here, it will be sufficient for my present purpose to say that a kind of universalism has always existed in India side by side with the particularisms of popular faiths. We meet with this kind of particularism in the early religion of Israel; but while it died out there with the growth of the uncompromising monotheism of the prophets, in India, under the protecting wings of Vedāntic monism, they have been allowed to live and grow almost unmolested. But though we had no fierce antagonism between the gods, sectarian differences always existed. We read in the life of Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, for instance, that even so late as the close of the last century the worship of Krishna could not be always tolerated by a devotee of the goddess Kālī. But Rāmkrishna taught that not only were Krishna and Kālī the same, but that even Jesus Christ was not different from either. As in other matters, so in this also, Rāmkrishna had his pioneers, and one of these, a friend and disciple of Rajah Ram Mohun Roy, had composed a hymn which strung together "God, Krishna, Kālī, Khodā" as names of One God. What Galilee was to Jesus, that was Gokul to Krishna, and one of Rāmkrishna's most favourite songs said, "Kālī, thou hast secretly come to Gokul and hast assumed the mask of Krishna"; and in all his ecstatic moods, in later days, he used to mix up the mythological stories of Kālī and Krishna together, and would seem to realise either in the form and amidst the surroundings of the other.

One day, it is said, he took a devout Indian Christian gentleman, who had gone to see him, to the temple of Kālī. Some of his disciples evidently looked upon it as an act of desecration; but none dared to oppose him. As they stood on the steps of the temple in full view of the goddess, Rāmkrishna touched his Christian friend gently and asked, "What do you see?" "Why," the visitor replied, "my Christ, my Jesus is here; I see him on the cross." And as the Christian gentleman stood lost in ecstatic wonder, Rāmkrishna turned to his disciples and said: "What do you think, rascals! cannot my Mother appear as Christ to a Christian devotee of hers?" The story shows both Rāmkrishna's hypnotic powers and his ideas of universalism.

Noble as was the life of Rāmkrishna, he, too, had his limitations. These were due to his training and associations. For the realisation of modern ideals of religion we must transcend those limitations, but we cannot ignore that saintly lives like Rāmkrishna's have always a message for all times and all men. The message of Rāmkrishna's life is that, despite intellectual errors, those who thirst after righteousness are filled, and those who cleanse themselves, with prayer and penance, of self and sin do see God. It is a needful message for this age, which has a tendency to reduce religion more and more to a process of intellection—needful equally for India and England.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Church again holds the first place in this month's Nineteenth Century. Dr. Guinness Rogers, indefatigable in his assaults on the Sacerdotalists and his plea for Disestablishment, writing on "The Nation and the Ritualists," while Mr. R. Bosworth Smith follows on the other side hoping that in the present crisis the "Holborn recusants" may yet come to a better mind and not drive the vessel of the Church on to the rocks, where she would inevitably split into several fragments. An article on "The Great Tractarian," by Mr. Herbert Paul, leads one to expect another ecclesiastical study, but though the hero turns out to be a Halifax, he was great, not in the Church, but as a writer of political tracts—the great Trimmer of Charles II.'s reign. Lord Carrington tells in an extremely interesting manner of his successful experiments with allotments for agricultural labourers on his estates, by which many sturdy men are kept from drifting into the towns; and Mr. J. A. Gibson writes further on the Nordrach cure for consumption. Education is dealt with in two articles, Mr. J. Churton Collins writing on the further possibilities of the University extension scheme in "A University for the People," while Mr. Anthony Traill, of Trinity College, Dublin, warns Mr. Balfour and all reformers off the precincts of his college, and in regard to the vexed question of a Roman Catholic University for Ireland, suggests as the only feasible plan to meet all the requirements of the case, the revival of the lay college at Maynooth, which would be far enough from Dublin not to be mischievous.

This question is also dealt with in the Contemporary in a trenchant article by Mr. E. J. Dillon, declaring Mr. Balfour's scheme to be impracticable, and this is all the ecclesiastical politics in the present number, except for a short article by "A Conservative," deprecating the clerical plea for relief from the rating of tithe. Mr. W. J. Stillman writes an impartial and valuable article on "The Peace of Europe," pointing to the chief centres of danger in the Balkan States, in Alsace-Lorraine, and in the Papal hankering after temporal power. Mrs. Fawcett writes in vindication of the Vaccination Act of 1898, not as an anti-vaccinationist, but showing how the reasons given for compulsion have been proved illusory, and urging that effective isolation is the surest preventive of epidemic. Another interesting article deals in a sympathetic manner with "The Jewish Immigrant," giving good reasons for a modification of the current opinion of these humble workers. The article on an Italian Army Evangelist should also be noted, giving an account of Capellini, the founder and pastor of the Military Evangelical Church of Italy.

HELPFUL SERVICES.

SIR,—To anyone who has the welfare of our denomination at heart, it must indeed be a pleasure to read such sentiments as those put forth by the Rev. Wilfred Harris and Mr. Thomas Gordon, in your issue of the 4th inst. Both gentlemen give timely expression to the opinions held by a rapidly-increasing number of Unitarians, who feel that the time has arrived for a really Christian effort to meet the needs of the average man in a more thorough manner than we have done hitherto.

Unfortunately our churches rarely appeal to any but one class of hearer—namely, the thinker who enjoys "an intellectual treat," and who does not desire to experience anything approaching religious emotion. Our churches are too often mere lecture-halls, and those who may wish for some real spiritual help in the battle of life cannot be expected to attend, and so go elsewhere as a matter of course. The sermon, lecture, or essay holds the premier place in our services, for the most part, little attention often being given to the devotional part of the service, which many regard simply as a necessary preliminary to the sermon.

I have taken Orthodox friends to some of our places of worship, and could not by any amount of persuasion get them to attempt the experiment a second time, for they were so disgusted and irritated with the slovenly rendering of the order of worship, the wretched music, and irreverent behaviour of the congregation, that by the time the sermon was reached they were in no fit frame of mind to do anything but adversely criticise it.

I am aware that the idea is to eliminate ceremony from our services, simplifying them as far as possible, but this, though very acceptable to a few, will never suit the many, for the multitude expect and enjoy what is called "a good service," and unless we bestir ourselves to provide them with it we altogether lose the hearing of the majority, who are kept away more by the baldness of the services than by any consideration of doctrine.

How many Unitarians there are within my own knowledge whom I have heard declare that they go to the local Unitarian chapel on principle, because it is Unitarian, and just tolerate the fare provided; exercising self-denial Sunday after Sunday. This, of course, applies more to the rising generation than to those who have become so accustomed to the old order of things as to see no room for improvement or to desire nothing better. Some of our churches have, I am glad to say, seen the need, and have made the necessary alterations—some adopting most of the methods of the Anglican Church, others working on more evangelical lines—and it is a striking thing to witness the rapid growth of their congregation and the increasing healthfulness of the Church life in these particular instances.

The people are ever ready to accept a really good thing when offered, and when they find they can obtain real spiritual help in the struggle against sin and temptation, coupled with a rational faith and cheery services, they will come.

March 7. W. LINDSEY-BADCOCK.

[When our correspondent says of our churches that they “rarely appeal to any but one class of hearer,” that is, in our view, a very grave exaggeration and misrepresentation of the condition of religious life in our community. But we have printed his letter because it contains suggestions worthy of serious consideration. To this we have referred more fully in another column.—ED. INQ.]

THE LATE REV. R. SPEARS.

SIR,—Amongst the many tributes to the Rev. R. Spears of admiration and gratitude which are flowing in from all sides, can you find room in THE INQUIRER for one more?

As honorary secretary of the Central Postal Mission, I wish to bear witness to his unflagging advocacy of the Postal Mission, and unfailing sympathy in the growth of the movement. There was no Unitarian Christian work that did not feel his genial sympathy. We of the Postal Mission felt this specially. In fact it was mainly due to him that the first experiment was made in England. “Yes, try it by all means,” he said, in his genial way, “you will be sure to get support”; and it was at a meeting convened by Mr. Spears that we formed our first committee. We did get very generous financial support subsequently from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

This magnificent hopefulness of Mr. Spears was such an untold help. Those lines of Dante’s always seem specially applicable to him—

“The Church Militant has no son, Stronger in hope than he.”

And it was hope based on unswerving faith in the greatness of our Unitarian faith, a readiness to work for it to the utmost of his power, and then to trust that others would do the same.

Who can measure the helpfulness of such hope and trust, or tell the wonderful response it called out from others!

His influence was like a full strong tide. No cause however struggling but felt strengthened by his presence; no person however insignificant and weak coming under his influence but felt inspired to do something for Unitarianism.

Never shall I forget my last interview with him just before his fatal illness, when he kindly hurried to College Chapel, Stepney, to offer a few words of encouragement and some practical help.

It is not likely that his mantle will fall upon another, but we must not let our regard for him waste itself in idle words. Difficult as the task may be, those of us who are left must strive to carry on the work so dear to him. We must strive to catch some of the glow of his genial faith, to transmit it to others, and to aid and support the weak and struggling.

FLORENCE HILL.

WILD BIRDS’ PROTECTION SOCIETY.

SIR,—In connection with the above as reported in your last issue, a lady at the annual meeting mentioned that a millinery establishment had been opened by Mrs. White at 8, Lower Seymour-street, where hats and bonnets are produced in modern and elegant designs, but void of all plumage from birds killed solely for such decoration. This ought to be more generally known, as the success of the enterprise depends upon its patronage, and it is to be hoped that the beneficent aim of its proprietress may not turn out a failure.

J. MOTT.

King’s Heath, March 9.

THE annual summary of statistics of the Churches for last year, in the New York Independent, shows 27,714,523 Church members in forty-eight denominations, which include 150 bodies, reckoning 20 different Lutheran bodies, 17 Methodist, 13 Baptist, and 12 Presbyterian. There are said to be 14,699 Catholic churches, with 8,395,178 members, but 52,779 Methodist churches, with 5,898,094 members. The Methodist Times points out that in their societies only adult members are reckoned, while the Catholics count all adherents, even the children, and that really there are many more Methodists than Catholics in the States. Of Unitarians the return gives 454 churches and 75,000 members. Writing of them in the general survey, Dr. Edward Everett Hale says:—

The Unitarian body is interested and gratified as it sees the steady advance of liberal sentiment in religion in all other communions. Such steps forward as are taken by the Union Theological Seminary, by the convention of the Episcopal Church, and in separate pulpits which cannot be counted, are all steps in the line to which the Unitarian body has consecrated its united efforts. The Congregationalists seem to be understanding more and more that unless they are Independents they are nothing; that is to say, that each church must arrange its own covenant or creed, or that each church may determine to work without any covenant or creed. The necessity for a separate organisation of Christians who gladly permit every man to come to God in his own way, will probably exist for many years to come. But what seems certain is that the relations of the Unitarian communion with other Christian Churches are becoming more sympathetic and co-operative.

So the words “rude,” “unpolished,” which describe him who disregards the amenities of social intercourse, imply that the individual has not been led by culture to discern and feel something which he ought to do as his contribution to the happiness and refinement of the circle into which he has been introduced. To please others, to make them happy and at ease, is a duty of social intercourse, as to pay one’s debts is a duty of business life.

OBITUARY.

MRS. R. J. JONES.

THE community of our churches in Wales has suffered a grievous loss in the death, on March 7th, of the wife of the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare. Mrs. Jones was a daughter of the late Evan Griffiths, architect and surveyor of Aberdare. She received a liberal education, and for some years after her marriage assisted her husband in the management of a school. On the establishment of the Aberdare County school in 1896, she was appointed one of the governors. For many years Mrs. Jones was a member of the Ladies’ Visiting Committee of the Merthyr Workhouse, and last spring was elected, unopposed, as one of the representatives of Aberdare on the Merthyr Board of Guardians. She was also a member of the Aberdare branch of the British Women’s Temperance Association, and often spoke in public on the evils of the liquor traffic. In her neighbourhood, Mrs. Jones was also a power politically, having been a prominent member of the Women’s Liberal Association, and of the Liberal Club. As the helper of her husband’s ministry she was indefatigable. Devoted to the Sunday-school and to other institutions connected with the chapel, she was seldom absent from the meetings of the Good Templars and the Christian Endeavour Society. When her husband was prevented from preaching, she often occupied the pulpit for him.

The funeral on Friday week was attended by a large number of friends, including nearly all the ministers of every denomination in the town and district. The services were conducted in the house by the Rev. J. Phillips, of Nottage, in the chapel by the Revs. J. Hathren Davies, W. James, Dr. Griffiths and Jenkyn Thomas, and at the cemetery by the Rev. R. Cribin Jones, of Lampeter. Expressions of sympathy and warm appreciation of the services rendered by Mrs. Jones have been received by her husband from the various public bodies with which she was connected, and from a wide circle of friends, including the Unitarian ministers of Glamorganshire.

At noon last Monday a meeting was held in the Liverpool Town Hall, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, Mr. W. Oulton, to inaugurate a fund for the erection of a memorial to Mr. Gladstone, who was a native of Liverpool. The meeting was thoroughly representative, without distinction of party. The motion for the inauguration of the fund was made by Mr. William Rathbone, who was chairman of Mr. Gladstone’s committee in the South Lancashire election of 1865, and afterwards in Parliament for twenty-five years was closely associated with him in political life. The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the first list of donations announced at the meeting amounted to £2,325, including £100 each from Mr. W. Rathbone, Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Messrs. Holbrook Gaskell, W. B. Bowring, R. D. Holt, F. H. Gossage, Charles W. Jones, and Walter Holland.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Selected from Proverbs xvi.-xix.

HEAR counsel and receive instruction, that thou mayest be wise in thy latter end.

There are many devices in a man's heart; but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand.

The fear of the Lord tendeth to life; and he that hath it shall abide satisfied.

He that getteth wisdom loveth his own soul: he that keepeth understanding shall find good.

Better is a little with righteousness than great revenues with injustice.

Better it is to be of a lowly spirit with the poor, than to divide the spoil with the proud.

Better is a dry morsel and quietness therewith, than a house full of feasting with strife.

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! yea, to get understanding is rather to be chosen than silver.

Whoso mocketh the poor reproacheth his Maker; and he that is glad at calamity shall not be unpunished.

Children's children are the crown of old men; and the glory of children are their fathers.

The hoary head is a crown of glory, when it is found in the way of righteousness.

The highway of the upright is to depart from evil: he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul.

A false witness shall not be unpunished, and he that uttereth lies shall perish.

He that keepeth the commandment keepeth his soul; but he that is careless of his way shall die.

He also that is slack in his work is brother to him that is a destroyer.

Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.

A merry heart is a good medicine, but a broken spirit who can bear?

A rebuke entereth deeper into one that hath understanding than a hundred stripes into a fool.

The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention, before there be quarrelling.

The discretion of a man maketh him slow to anger, and it is his glory to pass over a transgression.

A forward man scattereth abroad strife, and a whisperer separateth chief friends.

A man of violence enticeth his neighbour, and leadeth him in a way that is not good.

He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.

A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity.

He that covereth a transgression seeketh love; but he that harpeth on a matter separateth chief friends.

By mercy and truth iniquity is purged; and by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil.

Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.

The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth unto it and is safe.

He that giveth heed unto the word shall find good; and whoso trusteth in the Lord, happy is he.

THE only faith which is indispensable is fidelity.—Merriam's "Way of Life."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

How Good Can a Boy Be?

"I AM really as good as a boy can be." That was what a boy said the other day. Perhaps it sounds rather conceited, but he didn't mean it so. He is not a conceited boy; that is, not particularly so. He has a fairly good opinion of himself, I suppose, as most boys have. But his point was, that a boy couldn't be as good as a man. He hadn't as much opportunity. He didn't know as much. He hadn't experience enough. You wouldn't expect so very much of him. He meant that he himself was a fair average boy, with about as much goodness as you find in boys, but nothing like what you would expect in a man.

And this set me thinking how good it was possible for a boy to be?—just a commonplace, average boy. And I thought I would look, not in a story-book, where, of course, you can find boys made to order—from little Lord Fauntleroy down; nor for extraordinary heroisms, like Casabianca, for instance—but at the boys I came across, and see how good they were.

Last Christmas nearly everyone who usually helps in decorating the church was either ill, or busy, or absent. So I asked some boys to help. One came. Now I think it must be rather dull work for a boy to sit steadily for hours breaking evergreen into just the right sized bits to tie into wreaths, and perhaps spoiling his knife in doing it, with not another boy to speak to, and on the very first day of the holidays. It is not a bit like fun. And I thought after he had worked steadily all morning, "Perhaps my boy won't come this afternoon." But he did. He came the next morning and the next afternoon. He put up all the wreaths, doing exactly what he was told, and didn't act as if there were anything disagreeable in sticking to this dull work till it was done. I didn't see what better a man could have done.

So the first thing I saw about a boy's goodness was, A Boy can be Faithful. And I remembered the verse, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

Then I went to see one of our Sunday scholars, who was ill. He very often is ill, and while other boys are going to school or playing, he has to stay in bed, and the long hours pass so slowly. I found him in bed, with some toys beside him. After talking with him awhile, I said something to his mother about my being so sorry for all the anxiety and trouble she was having, and this is what she said: "Oh, Gordon is always so sweet-tempered, and never worries me. It doesn't seem as if he made any trouble."

Then I saw that A Boy can be Patient. And I thought of the verse, "Let us run with patience the race set before us."

I went to a friend who had just had to take her little boy to one of the London hospitals for a very serious operation. She couldn't stay with him herself. She had to leave him there, with her heart full of grief and anxious thought about all her little boy was to undergo, and she said: "I don't know how I could have borne it if Geoffrey had cried, or broken down, when I left him. But he wouldn't cry. The colour came into his face, and he straightened himself a little, that was all."

So I learned that even A little Boy can be Brave. And the verse came to my mind, "Thou, therefore, endure hardness as a good soldier of Christ Jesus."

There was another boy I knew, whose teacher had been complaining that he didn't attend to what she was saying in Sunday-school. He amused himself with making the other boys laugh. Now, this, of course, wasn't good; and I thought I would go and talk with his mother about it. John was just going out when I got to the house. I didn't quite like to begin with John's faults, so I spoke of something pleasanter that made his mother say: "John is such a help to me at home. He is so good with the baby; she wants to go to him the minute he comes in, and he eats his dinner and learns his lesson with her on his lap; and it is such a rest to me."

I was so pleased that I forgot all I had meant to say about John in school. I saw he was learning at home the best lessons of life. For you see, A Boy can be Helpful.

Very likely you can think of some other ways of a boy's being good. There is no end to them. But these four will do to-day:—

A Boy can be Faithful.

A Boy can be Patient.

A Boy can be Brave.

A Boy can be Helpful.

Are you?

C. A. F.

SIE JOSHUA FITCH, presiding at a drawing-room meeting in West Kensington last week, under the auspices of the Central and East of England Society for Women's Suffrage, (20, Great College-street, Westminster), drew attention to the great intellectual progress made by women during the last thirty years. Formerly, the only occupation thought suitable for refined gentlewomen was that of teacher, with the result that ladies who had neither adequate knowledge of the subjects they undertook to teach, nor knowledge of how to teach, crowded the profession, lowering the standard of remuneration. The number and variety of occupations now open to women in which they were doing valuable work was very great, and the public offices which they were now deemed competent to fill opened a wide vista of usefulness to them. He considered that the extension to women of the legal right of voting in the election of members of Parliament was the natural corollary of what they had already obtained. Referring to the greater educational advantages now available for women in comparison with thirty years ago, Sir Joshua spoke of Dean Colet's great foundation of St. Paul's School, the revenues of which have enormously increased, so that some portion is now devoted to the foundation of a similar school for girls.

THE progress of moral development consists, both for the individual and for society, in the successive apprehension of new and finer phases of obligation, or applications of the law of duty to others or to ourselves. He who would determine whether he is morally growing must inquire whether he has, besides maintaining his strength of moral principle and purpose, found fresh and more delicate issues to which the law of right within has constrained him.—Joseph May.

CHURCHES THAT MINISTER.

SELF-SATISFACTION is the one hopeless vice, whether in churches or individuals; and if in our religious community there is a certain amount of restlessness and dissatisfaction, that ought not to be regarded as altogether a bad sign. Even if criticisms are occasionally made which we know to be exaggerated and unfair, they may serve a good purpose in bringing out the truth, and may be credited at least with the desire for reform. There will generally be some ground for even the most exaggerated criticism that is offered, and by such direction we may learn to measure with more exactness the faults or weaknesses which have to be remedied.

We print to-day a letter from a correspondent repeating certain criticisms with which we have been long familiar, as to the intellectual quality of the preaching in our churches and the baldness of the services. He admits, indeed, that "some" of the churches have seen the need of something more, and we can only suppose that his survey of our churches has been extremely limited and unfortunate in its selections, to lead to so sweeping a judgment.

But underlying this criticism there is the earnest desire, which found expression also at the annual meetings of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission and of the Midland Christian Union, both of which we report to-day, that our churches should more truly minister to the religious needs of men. It would be lamentable indeed if we were satisfied with the hold we have upon the religious life of this country, and from many sides voices are heard pleading for greater devotion and greater sincerity of actual religious life and work.

No question of name, or of ecclesiastical order, or of forms of service, goes to the root of this matter. The life of a church depends upon two fundamental truths, of which we believe that the great majority of our people are well aware, and which when stated appear indeed the veriest common-places; yet if they are kept in mind, as the ruling principles of our fellowship, there is no longer any question as to the direction our efforts ought to take. The first of these truths is, that the church is for worship, and the second, that religion has to do with the real things of life.

We are told that too often the services in our churches are bald, and offer no satisfaction to those who come in as worshippers. Now as to this, we are not at all sure that "an attractive service" is not as false an attraction as "an intellectual treat"; and it by no means follows that because people crowd to a church where there is elaborate ritual and beautiful music, there is more religion there, and worshippers are brought nearer to God and find more help and strength for daily life than in the simple service of a Puritan meeting-house, or even in a silent meeting of Friends. In our churches much earnest thought is now being given, and rightly given, to the working out of the best and most helpful form of service, and we by no means wish to be understood as condemning or thinking lightly of liturgical forms, and the use of beautiful music. A liturgical element in the service may be extremely valuable, when used in the right spirit, in helping a congregation to realise that it is common worship in which they are united. But what we wish here especially to emphasise is the prior need, as indeed the first essential in every congregation, whatever form of service may be used—the need of reverence. The church is for worship, and this ought to be felt more deeply than it often seems to be, as our people are gathering together in the place of worship. A service is not felt to be "bald" or "unattractive," even when only a few come together in the plainest meeting-house, if they come with hearts prepared for worship, with a sense of the Divine Presence, and of the holy purpose for which they are gathered. It is easy to criticise the minister—and often he is open enough to criticism—but it is the people who are the church, and by the spirit in which they are gathered together determine the measure of the religious life which will be felt by those who come in. It would be difficult to estimate how much of the weakness of our churches is due to a defective sense of duty in this matter on the part of the congregation—a heedlessness of what is required of each one in the gathering for worship to build up the living strength of a church, to minister in spiritual things to those who come in. Questions as to the form of service to be used, and what opportunities may be given to the people to take articulate part in the worship, are of much importance, but none are so vital as this, whether they understand the supreme purpose of their gathering together.

To be true worshippers of the living God, and to offer to others also the fellowship of this communion in spiritual worship, is, then, the great purpose for which we are gathered into our churches. And, with this, if our churches are to live and extend their influence in the world, must go with growing strength the conviction of the second fundamental principle—that religion has to do with the real things of life. The preaching of the minister and the prayers of minister and people together must be in touch with the great realities of the inward life, which make all the reality of the outward world as well, for the building up of the kingdom of God. They must not neglect doctrine, for it is essential that we should think truly, and be clear as to what we mean when we love and worship God, and seek forgiveness and cleansing from sin, and strive to follow CHRIST. But, at the same time, we must be doers of the word, which has thus possessed our souls, and our churches, if they are to minister of the things of God to the world, must be more and more concerned, with a clear-sighted, practical helpfulness, with all the needs of daily life and all the efforts that make for righteousness, for enlightenment, and true brotherhood among men.

The future of our churches will brighten more and more as we learn more perfectly to forget ourselves in these two great endeavours, to be humble, faithful worshippers of the living God, and to be true helpers of our brethren.

THY BEST.

WHATE'ER thou dost, do well—it may not stand

An hour, it may for centuries endure;
But thou shalt have performed thy Lord's command,

And thy reward shall be forever sure.

It may not be a palace thou dost rear,
It may be but a cottage for the poor;
No matter, 'tis the Lord's; be of good cheer,

Palace or cottage, thy reward is sure.

Here thou must learn to work; earth is God's school;

Let not thy hours in idleness be spent;
Bow thy stiff neck, thy stubborn spirit rule,

What thy Lord sets thee, do, and be content.

When He has tried and fully proved thy worth—

Found thee obedient, diligent, and true,
Then He will take thee from His school of earth,

And in His heaven-world give thee work to do.—SELECTED.

CHRIST AND COMMON PEOPLE.

III.—TO CALL SINNERS.

To call sinners and to denounce sinners are not the same thing. The one is the spirit of Christ, the other is the spirit which crucified Christ. Both works may, perhaps, be good and necessary, and each doubtless has its own peculiar dangers; yet the call is the deeper and rests on the unbroken love of God; the denunciation is the shallower, and only points to the breaking of our human love. Supreme is the goodness of God toward men, the secondary good is the goodness of men toward God. Sin is not the worst conceivable evil, it is but lack of love in the creature; lack of love in the Creator would be worse, and for there to be a soul whom God no longer loved. Hence to point out God's love is greater than to point out man's sin. Hence the moralist is one thing, the Christian another, and they part company in very deep waters.

Christ called sinners. Are we doing the same? Do we so deeply love them, as he loved them, that we yearn, as he yearned, to be ever with them and give our lives, if need be, as he gave his, to save and to redeem them? It is this spirit which calls sinners. Is this the spirit which animates us? Or are we of another spirit? Is there not some question among us as to whether, with our views of the Almighty, our greater love for mankind, and our deeper horror of sin, we are not excused from the simple work of saving souls altogether?

Indeed, the very sin of the sinner is made into an excuse. There should be no good news for sinners, say some, but good news for the righteous only, and sinners must become saints ere God will help them to reform!

The spiritual, like the temporal, aristocracy is apt to hedge itself about; and it is possible so to degrade religion that the purity of the human heart becomes the supreme object of divine worship. This is idolatry: man at best is but an image of God; and this human idol, the worship of the good man, may sometimes be a greater danger to true spiritual religion, because it is a more subtle danger, than any other idolatry. This idol once set up has to be guarded, as the ark of the covenant was guarded, from falling. It is held to be dangerous to make bad people religious, lest religion and morality should not always go together, and God be worshipped when the idol is absent; and devotion be associated, as Christ was with sinners. It is thought well to keep the sinner from praying lest prayer-meetings and public-houses should both appeal to the same low class of people, and the church vestry be as disreputable in appearance as God's world is in reality.

There is an anxiety to keep the Holy Spirit far away from sin, and sinners far away from the Holy Spirit. We seem to fear that God, if He were put to the test, would prove powerless in wicked hearts. We would defend Him from the danger of an overthrow. We are anxious to uphold His dignity, and that the righteous, or seemingly so, should come to our churches and do God credit; but the publican and all notorious sinners we would rather should beat their breasts elsewhere, and not debase our clean temple with their really true confessions and genuine cries for mercy.

We have advanced a long way beyond Christ in these days. We are trying hard to save our churches, "to this end are we come into the world" might be our motto. Would it not be better, even for our churches, if we tried, like Christ, to save the people?

If we do not mind, we shall be doing with our churches what the Scribes and Pharisees did with their temple and synagogues: we shall be having our churches in one place and the common people in another. We shall separate religion from humanity, man from God, and find the denunciation of Christ directed against ourselves.

For Christ will go with the common people. Wherever they are, there is his temple: clean or unclean and needing to be cleansed, the temple of God is in the hearts of common people, and there Christ will kneel and pray; if we be not there, we shall not be with him.

If we send messengers to Christ to ask about his observance of our standards, to object to his breaking of our rules and traditions and defending sinners in their misfortunes and spiritual darkness against our superior arrogance of conceited righteousness and privilege, may we not find in Christ's answer somewhat to give us pause? What if he prefers them to us, and the spirit of their lives in spite of all, to the spirit of ours, our virtues notwithstanding?

To stand on high ground that we may the better throw stones at others, is not righteousness. Nor, being righteous, is it Christianity to raise the perpetual cry of "Crucify, crucify!" teaching the hatred and learning it, instead of the love of our fellow-men.

As to sin and sinners, it is not the multitude of his sins, but the nature and quality of his sin that most condemns a man. A multitude of a thousand sinners beating their breasts or one single man justifying himself, which weighs heaviest and touches the deepest mark of real sin? To neglect my outward duty to my neighbour man, or in the inmost calculations of my soul to forget my debt to God?

If I dare tell God that I am better than my fellow-man, more loved of God than another, and in God's sight exult in this, rejoicing in my neighbour's sin, whilst even my neighbour perhaps is sorry for it, do I not touch a deeper depth of thorough wickedness than any number of sinners, who, for the most part, have this modesty, to be afraid of God and to tremble in His presence asking only and almost hopelessly His infinite Mercy?

Common people are not irreverent at heart. They are not blasphemous in soul. Some sins, though they be many, can be forgiven. But one, not to forgive one's neighbour, is not easy to forgive.

The most righteous man would not be so but for God's gift. And no man who feels sin and its sadness can ever wish to insult the sufferer. It were better we had no righteousness, than that we had conceit and pride in it. The sinful world may be but an imperfect heaven; but the self-righteous world is a perfect hell.

All goodness in this world comes from God, and if we would have joy in ourselves in life and in one another, we must have God so high above us all, that no man can, in His sight, claim to be higher, morally, than another. So infinitesimal at that great distance are all human differences, that side by side with one another all are equal. All men before God bow equally, and all are sinners together. "Why callest thou me good?" said Christ. Before God this is our equal estate, and all men in His sight must equally acknowledge their guilt. The absolute knowledge that it is so, and this acknowledgment of it before God—the sense at all events that God is used to sin and sinners, and has perhaps a place in His heart none others have for such—brings us with all our sins and the burden of them to seek God and confess to Him first of all. And there is in this unavoidable confession to God a certain sense of home-coming and relief that relieves, and is intended to relieve, much of the burden all human lives must bear. No man will find joy in God who cannot thus go to God with all his sins upon him, and go to God freely as the sinner that he is and will continue to be for ages and ages yet, progress he in virtue fast or slow. For the sense of our sinfulness will increase upon us, as our single sins are one by one fought off; and if the sense of sin were to rob us of our joy in God, our joy would diminish as our virtue increased. From the first we must accept our human and sinful estate, and bear in mind from the outset that, though we may come nearer to our own joy by moral effort, we shall never come nearer to God than His mercy.

Should we neglect this thought, we shall lose the secret of the soul's salvation, spurn God's love, the greatest thing, and seek to save our souls, the lesser. We may gain many things and lose the greatest; may grow self-centred, self-esteeming, self-righteous, and lose love, gratitude, grace, and prayer. It is God who works in us to do good, and above all to be and to become better: it is God who points out to us our faults and failings, and the more we are with God the more we feel our faults and see them; and the more we see and feel them the more do we seek to be with God, and with more joy than ever do we remember Him and seek His help. Let sinners, then, draw near to God; let the sense of sin draw them, the deeper they feel it the more let them come. Herein is the gospel and the good tidings of God. God is the friend of sinners. So Christ taught, and truly, the gospel of God to common people, and became himself the sinners' friend and called them.

Christ called sinners; and because he did not denounce them, but became their friend, and bore their reproach and their sins upon his heart, his enemies—who were denouncing sinners—instituted the first crusade in defence of public morality, petitioned the Government, brought in the arm of the law, and had "the friend of publicans and sinners" publicly crucified.

The cross of Christ has been a stumbling block for ages; do we see quite clearly even yet who it was that killed him? Simply to denounce sinners is to crucify Christ and all his sympathies, but to call sinners is to follow him. Which are we doing—denouncing, with the arm of the law, or calling in the spirit of friendship?

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

The annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union and Provincial Assembly was held on Monday, March 13, at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, president, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. J. C. Street, A. A. Charlesworth (secretary), A. H. Shelley, J. H. Matthews, J. Howard, P. Dean, W. J. Clarke, E. D. P. Evans, H. H. Johnson, A. W. Timmis, R. Davis, E. P. Hall, H. McKean, and V. Herford; Messrs. J. A. Kenrick (treasurer), T. Grosvenor Lee, H. New, G. Titterton, T. W. Ryland, E. L. Tyndall, J. H. Forrester, and others.

The Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH read the Report of the Committee.

The Report stated that they had been able to carry steadily forward the good work which had been entrusted to them. The new church at Small Heath was opened in October, and the Committee thanked many generous friends who subscribed to the building fund. Including the £870 given by the trustees of the Church of the Saviour (a donation which was to be specially recognised by a mural tablet in the church), there had been received £2,817 10s. 9d., but, unfortunately, that did not meet the indebtedness by £527 11s. 11d., which still remained to be raised. The union had sustained a severe loss by the death of Mr. Charles Cochrane, one of the vice-presidents, who had bequeathed to the union a legacy of £1,045. Financially the union was not in an altogether satisfactory position. The receipts during the year showed a decrease in donations of £200. The expenditure had been heavier, so that whereas at the beginning of the year there was a balance in hand of £127, at the close there was a balance due to the treasurer of £270 5s. 5½d. There would be certain savings during the coming year, but it was obvious that if the union were to carry on their work effectually they needed money. A singularly depressing feature of the accounts was the steady decrease in the subscription list, and unless there was a financial improvement the work must be curtailed. It would be a pity if they were to be compelled to reduce the grants to aided churches, already too small, and it would be more lamentable if they were driven to abandon all forward movements. The Committee, therefore, suggested that each congregation should take the matter into serious consideration, and endeavour to enlist the sympathies and active co-operation of all its members in the sacred cause of spiritual enlightenment and liberty.

Mr. J. A. KENRICK read the statement of accounts, which showed the income during the year to have amounted to £439 11s. 11½d., including subscriptions £119 4s., donations £52 1s., grants from British and Foreign Unitarian Association £160, and congregational collections £59 1s. 8½d. The expenditure amounted to £709 17s. 5d., including grants £462 4s. 4d., and donations to the new church at Small Heath £100. The accounts consequently showed an adverse balance on the year's transactions of £270 5s. 5½d.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the past year had, in some respects, been most eventful. The erection of the church at Small Heath arose out of a movement which was begun six years ago for the extension of church principles and church activities in Birmingham. The total indebtedness on that church was very large—£527. £200 had been lent by the Union up to the present time without interest; but they would have to consider whether they could continue to lend the money without interest.

He alluded to the death of Mr. Cochrane, saying that the Union had never had a better friend, and to make up for his loss the subscription list ought to be increased by at least £100 a year. That was not beyond their power, and it was a matter which must be faced by the Union. He thought the country churches in the province might rise to the occasion in a more generous way than they had done in the past. He did not think the help received from them was equal to their resources. They must look to the churches in the district for an increase in the subscription list rather than to the churches in Birmingham, because the latter were burdened with two great missions, which they carried on out of their own resources. Unless something was done to improve the financial position of the Union, they would have to cut down the grants given in aid of certain churches. That would be a very serious matter, but it would have to be faced if the income was not largely increased during the coming year.

Mr. G. TITTERTON seconded the resolution, remarking that it would be a shame if they, the most advanced guard in the Christianity of to-day, were to neglect the opportunity of enforcing their views. The opponents of free thought and freedom in all religious matters were extremely active, and were pushing their views as hard as at any time since the Reformation. The Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church were endeavouring to get that position in connection with England, which meant new chains for intellectual freedom, and, therefore, they, the defenders against that aggression, ought to be more earnest and more active in developing their works than had been the case in the past.

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE suggested that the word Christian should be omitted from the title and description of the Union. Its adoption, he thought, had adversely affected the subscription list. He urged that the committee should reconsider the name of the union, so that it might go forth that they stood for Unitarianism, a wide, free, unfettered Unitarianism. Personally, he would not care to again become a member of the union unless they made it clear what their aims and objects were.

The Rev. J. C. STREET considered that Mr. Lee's speech placed them in a very embarrassing position, because they could not discuss the subject in the time at their disposal that day. He thought a special meeting should be called to consider it.

The CHAIRMAN said that if any change was to be made in the name of the Union it must be made by the Association itself. If it were deemed desirable the committee might be instructed to consider the matter with the view of calling a special meeting of the Association to discuss it. He was strongly opposed to the suggestion that the financial success of a society was any reason for making such a fundamental change in its name as Mr. Lee indicated, or that the financial success or weakness of a society was any proof that it was on wrong lines. He had yet to learn that those associations which had the name Unitarian were better off than the Midland Union, or were doing better work. It was not the name which attracted, but the principles. He himself was not a minister of a Unitarian congregation. The question raised was a very old one.

It had aroused very great feelings on the part of great leaders of their denomination, and men like Dr. Martineau, Mr. Thom, and Mr. Beard were strongly opposed to the course Mr. Lee advocated. He was not at all ashamed of the position of the Union. He was proud it was undogmatic, and that there were other unions in the country which were undogmatic.

The resolution was carried unanimously; and Mr. T. G. LEE afterwards moved: "That the committee be asked to consider the advisability of including the name Unitarian in the title of the Association, either with or without further names, and to report to a special meeting of the Association."

Mr. G. TITTERTON seconded the resolution, which was carried.

On the motion of Mr. T. W. RYLAND, seconded by Mr. E. L. TYNDALL, a vote of thanks was accorded the officers and committee for their services during the year.

On the motion of the Rev. R. DAVIS, seconded by Mr. J. P. P. DUTFIELD, the officers were elected for the ensuing year as follows:—President, the Rev. L. P. JACKS; vice-presidents, the Revs. H. Eachus, H. McKean, and J. Wood, Messrs. C. Harding, H. New, G. New, W. H. Talbot, G. Titterton, and A. W. Worthington; treasurer, Mr. J. A. Kenrick; secretary, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth. The committee were also appointed.

THE LUNCHEON.

The delegates and visitors were subsequently entertained to luncheon at the Grand Hotel. The Rev. L. P. JACKS (who was unable to be present at the business meeting) presided, and on behalf of the members of the Church of the Messiah extended a cordial welcome to the company. He said they had met under auspicious circumstances. The report showed a record of good work done, and although the balance-sheet was a little discouraging it could be improved another year if the delegates and ministers would make an effort on behalf of the Union. The visitors were welcomed at the Church of the Messiah as fellow-servants in the great cause of civil and religious liberty, and he especially welcomed the Rev. E. P. Barrow, of Manchester, one of that small, but growing, band of noble men who had forsaken the ampler opportunities and greater attractions of the Church of England in order to become a minister of Christ among the Free Churches. They could assure Mr. Barrow that there was no field where there was greater need for the abilities he possessed, though perhaps there were many fields of work where the reward was more immediate and more apparent.

Mr. H. E. PERRY (Wolverhampton) proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Jacks, the wardens, and members of the congregation of the Church of the Messiah for their hospitality.

The Rev. R. DAVIS (Evesham) seconded the resolution, which was supported by the Rev. E. P. BARROW, and carried.

Mr. T. W. RYLAND responded.

THE AFTERNOON MEETING.

After lunch a meeting was held in the Church of the Messiah, under the presidency of the Rev. L. P. JACKS. It had been announced that the Rev. Dr. Hicks, of London, would deliver an address on "Unitarian Theism and Religious Rationalism," but, unfortunately, Dr. Hicks was unable to be present through indisposition.

In his absence the Rev. J. C. STREET spoke on "Retgression or Progress During the Last Fifty Years." He said the newspapers and others had for a long time been saying that the group of churches represented there—and for the want of a better name they called them the Unitarian churches—were a perishing quantity, that they were a disappearing body, that their forces were diminishing, that their resources were lessening, and that they were less to be counted upon in the great issues of religious life to-day than their forefathers were. In their own ranks there were not a few who had been saying all sorts of deplorable things about them. Articles had been written giving an account of their failures and their imperfections, and laying before the general public a most doleful account of their condition. He thought his audience, however, would be of opinion that there was something of importance to be said on the opposite side. Forty years ago their congregations were comparatively few numerically, but since then there had been a wonderful development. It was not true that they were perishing, that their number was diminishing, that they had fewer churches or ministers, that their churches were less influentially supported, or that the benefactions of their people were smaller than they were. How could their churches be perishing or diminishing when during the last half of the nineteenth century they had added more than a hundred churches to their ranks? That was not an overpowering success, and the record was not so brilliant as the record of more popular churches; but it was at least an answer to those who said they were diminishing and perishing. As a matter of fact, more progress had been made in connection with their Free Churches during the last half century than was made during the half century after the death of Jesus Christ, when he came into the world and preached the gospel of Christianity.

Mr. G. BASNETT expressed an opinion that the reason the Unitarians made less headway than other bodies did was because the sermons preached in the Unitarian churches were usually so intellectual that the generality of people were not attracted by them, in comparison with sermons preached in connection with other denominations. There was more enthusiasm infused and more emotion brought to bear on the congregations in other denominations than in the Unitarian body.

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE wished the ministers would occasionally devote a Sunday morning to telling the young people what Unitarians believed and why they differed from other bodies. He did not believe that Unitarianism had gone back during the last fifty years, and he was convinced it would go forward during the next half century if they only had the courage to state their opinions.

The Rev. J. WOOD said their ministers were so interested in religion and in the religious welfare of their congregations that they preached on religion rather than on theology. The influence of the Church on the thought of the orthodox Church was immeasurable. There were thousands of Unitarians in the Church of England, in the Congregational, Baptist, and Presbyterian churches, and if there could be an exodus of Unitarians, it would be greater far than the famous exodus from Egypt. He did not believe their want of success was due to too much intellectuality or to too much theology, and he was sure they would not bring up their people aright unless they gave them intellectual ground for the faith they held.

The Rev. H. H. JOHNSON thought the main reason for their lack of success was due to the number of Broad Churchmen in the Church of England and the so-called liberal-minded men in the Nonconformist orthodox bodies.

At the close of the discussion the Rev. J. C. STREET replied, and the session terminated.

In the evening there was a service at the Church of the Messiah, the sermon being preached by the Rev. E. P. BARROW, of Manchester.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE annual meeting of this mission was held at Padiham on Tuesday, March 7. Service was held in Nazareth Chapel in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. W. H. BURGESS, B.A., of Accrington, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, B.A., of Gee Cross.

As Unitarians, the preacher said, they could each answer only for themselves. In that freedom of thought and individual responsibility was the fundamental basis of Unitarianism—out of which historically it had sprung, and out of which throughout its history it was ever being born anew. Glory had been shed on their churches in the past by the liberty they had enjoyed; they had been blessed in the exercise of unshackled freedom of thought, while a dead weight pressed on the soul of the man who had to think in intellectual and spiritual chains. Such a man could not concern himself only with the question of what was true, he had to ask himself, "What have I signed?" "What belief will save or damn me, according to my creed?" "What is my catechism?" It was a surprise to him (the preacher) that the title "free" should be assumed by churches engaged in propounding new catechisms and new crystalisations of belief for coming generations. Freedom from State control was little, if there was set up in place of bondage to the State, a self-imposed creed or catechism amid churches nominally free, yet really bound in intellectual and spiritual chains. The first plank of their Unitarian platform was freedom of thought for all who desired to worship with them, whether ministers or people. A second principle on which they were equally agreed, was the pre-eminence of the religious life in their midst. In laying down that principle he did not for a moment mean to say they were better than others. They thanked God for the privilege of their faith, and noble principles, but they did not claim that they had risen to their ideal. Nevertheless, he found that it was the special and peculiar mark of their principles that life with them was everything, and that the importance of belief was measured just by its effect on life. They, as Unitarians, did not under-value the faith which was the living and inspiring source of life to them on earth and in Heaven, but they remembered the words of Christ, "By their fruits ye shall know them." They considered that in the Christian Church there had been too much tendency to regard religious truth as a sort of talisman, having a mysterious power to open the door of Heaven, apart from the influence on human life, and against that they protested with all their souls. Nothing had been more misunderstood than what was called "saving faith." This had been regarded, and was regarded still, by people who made catechisms, as a faith in abstract doctrines and an intellectual acceptance of certain beliefs as being a good in itself, apart from its effect on life; that in the unfathomable mysteries of the Divine Essence to hold one opinion was to be sure of Heaven, and to hold another was to be doomed to Hell. It was not against intellectual devotion to the truths of God that they as Unitarians protested, but against the superstition that a mysterious doctrine had any value in itself. No one was more anxious than they for the Divine light on their way, but that being so, they stood or fell before God and their consciences, on earth and in Heaven, not by what they thought, but by what they were.

Speaking on the question of the Ritualistic revival beginning with the Tractarian Movement sixty years ago, which, he said, was now shaking the Church of England to its base, the preacher said the duty was incumbent upon them of raising their voices for the religion of life and not of mere forms and ceremonies. There were two sides to the Ritualistic movement; there was the æsthetic side and the sacramental. Against the æsthetic side they had not a word to say. It had their sympathy, and even their co-operation. But what the forms expressed was everything, and the present Ritualism was a revival not only of artistic beauty in religious worship, but a revival of a rampant—or what was becoming a rampant—Sacerdotalism, and against that they were called upon to lift up their voice. If they, as a church, stood for anything, it was for a principle the very opposite of Sacerdotalism, as they believed Christ did. Sacerdotalism was death to the living spirit of each worshipper, and was the grave-clothes of the worship of each individual soul.

The business meeting was held at the close of the service. Councillor H. C. JACKSON, of Padiham, President of the Mission, in the chair. A satisfactory report and statement of accounts were read and adopted. Mr. J. W. BARLOW, of Atherton, was appointed president for the ensuing year; Mr. THOMAS HARWOOD, chairman of committee; the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT, vice-chairman; the Revs. R. TRAVERS HERFORD and J. HARRISON, secretaries. The customary resolutions were passed, and tea was subsequently served in the school-room.

THE EVENING MEETING.

A public meeting was held in the chapel in the evening, Councillor JACKSON in the chair, supported by the Revs. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, J. H. WICKSTEED, N. ANDERTON, and W. E. ATACK (representative of the Manchester District Association), and Mr. THOMAS HARWOOD, Chairman of Committee of the Mission. Mrs. CROMPTON, of Rivington, who had been announced as one of the speakers, was prevented by illness from being present.

The CHAIRMAN said they all knew that the services that afternoon and evening had one object in view, which was to create and sustain a deeper interest in mission work. He sometimes thought they did not take this so much to heart as they ought to do, and did not bestir themselves sufficiently. He then went on to refer to the book, "What would Jesus do?" and commended it to his hearers.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, in a stirring address, said he had heard with pleasure of the fine spirit of independence in that congregation of working people, and of how they had built their chapel themselves, by their own energy and self-sacrifice. They had to look to the people more and more. The old Presbyterian autocrat was a grand individual, for whom he had an almost unlimited amount of respect; but a great many of these fine old families had disappeared, and they had to fill their places by the people coming in. Proceeding, he said they were living in the time of reaction both in politics and religion. They found in the Church the great sacerdotal movement, and if there were any who could raise their voices, fearless and undaunted, it was themselves. They must not let the spirit of individual Christianity, and the opposition to the idea of a priesthood between God and man, die. Let them try to do something against this evil which was doing so much to sap away the religious life of the world. They had to show what a Free Church was. They had to show that they meant more than freedom from State control. They must have the spirit of freedom and loyalty to conscience alone. He thought they had not half realised their duties. They had a great deal of public spirit in their churches. They had men of large means, and they would give with an almost unequalled generosity to Universities and educational schemes. They wanted the same spirit showing in their own church life. They wanted real self-sacrifices in this matter. How many were there who sacrificed what they missed for Unitarian Christianity? Thus they came to the working people and asked them to take up the mission work. He thought in the district they had a very fine opening for mission work. They called upon all who could do any work in this mission to come and take it up. The religion they held dear to their hearts must become dearer every year. There would be a good response, if the word was only powerfully spoken. That work was the grandest work the church could do, and it kept a church alive. He was not afraid of a debt. If they did the work the money would come. He was certain they had many in the district who would rally to the call, and the work would be made more glorious, larger, and better year by year.

The Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, in welcoming the representatives of kindred societies, said it seemed they had to hold up the torch of pure religion at the present day as strongly as it had ever been held up before. The Evangelical Free Churches, as they called themselves, were not free—and they might hope that they were able to be more Evangelical—to carry the torch of pure religion unfettered by creed or dogma, and just to speak the Word of God as it came to them, to utter the prayers in their heart to God and to worship without any thought as to whether it was orthodox. As regarded the Ritualistic movement, it savoured, to him, too much of saving souls by machinery. They had to hold up the torch of pure religion, and no priest ordained by apostolic succession could save a man if his own spirit was not full of devotion and enthusiasm. The gospel which was only kept in private, which was made to save their own souls and none other, was a poor thing.

The Rev. W. E. ATTACK responded.

The Rev. N. ANDERTON said they must recognise that their Orthodox brethren had got hold of the right spirit; but the important thing was not the means by which they saved, but the spirit they did their work in. They had to stand forth for religion as opposed to dogma, and they had to throw wide open the doors for every one to come in. They desired to give them the power to become better men and women, not to make them intellectually true. They could not take a better example than Jesus, who never argued concerning God, but came to the world with an affirmative faith. The true missionary spirit was born of faith, and not of theology. Proceeding, he said the name Unitarian meant freedom. They had a splendid gospel of which they need not be ashamed, but of which they might all be proud. They were moving together to establish the one Church of the future. If they were true to the spirit of the faith handed down to them, and true to the gospel in their own hearts, then that church would be a reality sooner perhaps than expected.

Mr. HARWOOD having also spoken, the meeting concluded.

"INDUSTRIAL PEACE: the fruit of Righteousness" is the subject of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. Out of the confusion of labour conflicts and the puzzling questions involved Mr. Hargrove sees in co-operation a way of peace most likely to prove effectual:—

"Surely in the development of this partnership in business, so that all employed should share directly, as all must do indirectly, in losses and gains, is our hope for the future; that as we subsist by our industries, we should be united, rich and poor, in steady, intelligent, hearty carrying on of them. This is not the place to dwell upon the principles of Co-operative Production, nor do I for a moment pretend that it is right, or would be expedient for all employers to take their workmen into partnership. Attempts of the kind have failed disastrously in the past, and every failure is a set-back to progress, and they who most have the cause at heart should proceed most cautiously. But there have been many successful experiments in later years, and the development will proceed of itself, peacefully and prosperously, if we pay attention and show favour to it. We ought to be discontented and ashamed of the present state of armed neutrality among those upon whom the welfare and the very existence of our Empire depends. Strikes and lock-outs are a disgrace to our good sense, and a mockery of our religious professions; in each case both parties claim to be in the right, and if either were to confess that its only concern was to extort the most it could in work or wages, independent of what was just and right, the indignation of the land would overwhelm it. And yet, both appealing to right, they resort to mere force to determine it! It is as unreasonable as it is immoral, but up to now it has seemed inevitable.

"And now it is the business of all who profess any regard for that universal religion, whose supreme requirements are 'to do justice and to love mercy,' to bestir themselves to put speedy end to an intestine warfare which is the shame of our civilisation, and the flaw of our great strength. It is not for me to do more than suggest a way, a way still indistinct, and questionable, but which next century may be trodden by peaceful multitudes. One thing I do say with authority—authority not mine own, but that which all men hold sacred—that the question of wages which so troubles us is a moral and a religious one, and that it admits of a permanent and satisfactory solution only on consideration of what is just and kind. 'When there is poured out upon us from on high the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord, then will justice make her abode in our cities, and righteousness be the law of our land, and the fruit of righteousness will be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and confidence for ever.'"

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

IN this letter it is my purpose to say nothing about the London churches within the limits of the Provincial Assembly, except that they are now engaged in carrying out the scheme for raising £10,000 to celebrate the jubilee of the London District Society in the coming year. A strong tide of enthusiasm is rising in all the churches, and there are evidences on every hand that they are determined to make this effort a great success. If nothing more were secured than the bringing of the churches into closer union with each other, this would more than compensate for all the labour and toil that may be involved. But when Unitarians make up their mind that anything ought to be done, they are not easily daunted by obstacles that may lie in the way. Their struggles in the past have inured them to difficulties, and have developed in them an energy which urges them forward with courage and hope of final victory.

The condition of our country churches does not vary much from year to year. They are not disturbed by anything of a very startling character, but have to work on without any outward show or ostentation. Their position is very much like that of the men who not long ago were making a tunnel, when a fall of rock shut in several of them for a time. One said "Well chaps, we may never get out of this alive, but we may as well go on with our bit of work while we can." And to work they set, in what they had every reason to suppose would be their tomb. Many of our friends are steadily and faithfully doing their bit of work in their little spheres, isolated from other religious communities by the hard rock-like creeds which orthodoxy has placed in their way. But let no one think lightly of the work of our small struggling country churches and their devoted pastors. Where would some of our large churches be, without the men and women of strong, stable character that are among their best workers? Who made these characters? The men very frequently, who are often badgered about raising money, who have the lowest stipends, who often go home with the feeling that they are a burden on the churches. But they may lift up their heads. Theirs is a lasting work, for they have wrought in imperishable material, not in silver and gold, but in the souls of men.

The removal of so many of our young people from our small towns and villages to the large industrial centres, has a very depressing effect upon those who have to maintain the various agencies in connection with our churches. The secession also from our ranks of others who were nurtured in Unitarian homes, and whose parents were the mainstay of our church, has not been without a weakening influence. Whether their secession has been the result of social attraction, or from the lack of any deep religious conviction, it is not for me to say, but the consequences have been disastrous to the communities with which they had been associated in their early life. It is in this direction we have suffered much in the churches of the south-eastern counties. While, however, as an organisation, we do not make the progress we desire, the heaven of natural religion is permeating all classes, and in the most unexpected places we discover those who are in full sympathy with our teachings, but who do not at present see their way to identify themselves with us.

Some of our churches are moving forward; I wish I could say this of them all. What all our churches need to realise more deeply is, that they are not only conservators of the faith, but preachers of it. While we believe that the chief function of the church is to build up the spiritual life of its members, we must not forget that this means a larger understanding of Divine truth, a deeper sympathy with Christ, an increased purity of motive and life, which this culture brings, and a complete consecration to the service of God and man. It is good to increase in knowledge and goodness, but the practical expression of these is a more entire forgetfulness of self and an intensified effort to carry the message of life and liberty to others. Churches that are engaged merely in the work of self-preservation and are satisfied with that, may be expected sooner or later to suffer from spiritual paralysis. May not this be one reason for the little progress we have made in the past. We have not been sufficiently alive to the growing religious needs of the times. When we look at what other denominations are doing, they seem to be far ahead of us in their effort to overtake the religious wants of an ever increasing population, while they are far behind us in their theological ideas. They are progressive chiefly in spreading what they believe to be the truth; we are progressive chiefly in seeking a clear apprehension of the truth.

The complaint is made by a few in our ranks that efforts are made to establish churches in new districts while churches in old districts are nearly empty, just as if one were the cause of the other. If, however, the new districts are left untouched we shall suffer the double loss of missing our opportunity where there are strong probabilities of success, and of concentrating energies on places where an angel from Heaven would wear out his strength in vain. I plead for our weaker churches, that they may be strengthened in every possible way, but I plead also for a wider extension of effort in the dissemination of great spiritual truths which keep men to a purer life and grander liberty. The example of the Rev. S. Gardner Preston, who has undertaken to conduct a series of week-night services in one of the suburban districts of Hastings, is worthy of being followed by other ministers, who might, with an immense advantage to their own churches and to the cause which they have at heart, do something towards reaching those in our towns and villages who have little opportunity of becoming acquainted with the Gospel we have to declare.

Special Sunday evening services were held at the close of last year at Fulham Green, where Unitarianism had never been preached before. A good deal of interest was excited, and several expressed their cordial assent to much which they had heard. It is hoped that at some not distant date another effort will be made. The district is large and offers a promising field for the establishment of a church. Special services were also held simultaneously at Ealing. They did not attract so many as we expected, but there was much to encourage. The question is still under consideration as to further effort in this important neighbourhood. A course of week-night lectures has just been concluded at Ilford, in Essex. The attendances were not satisfactory so far as numbers were concerned. The only available hall is in the Board-school, which is some distance from the main street, so that we had to contend with this disadvantage. There is a population of 20,000 in this comparatively new district, and it is calculated that in ten years time there will be 50,000. This is just one of those places where a plot of ground ought to be secured at once, and a temporary structure put up in faith of getting a congregation. The Orthodox bodies have already done this, and have made rapid progress.

The church lately established at Southend is making satisfactory progress. A morning service is contemplated. Hitherto an evening service only has been held. A Sunday-school is also being organised. The church at Walthamstow is also doing fairly well. The death of the Rev. R. Spears, who founded both of these churches, and who to the very last took the deepest possible interest in their welfare, has been very keenly felt, but the local friends are putting forth every possible effort to make successful the work which he had initiated and maintained in their midst. The beautiful church at Richmond, which was erected through the untiring energy and zeal of the Rev. S. Farrington, is now nearly, if not completely, free from debt, so that this financial burden will no longer press upon them and hinder them in their good work. The church at Chatham is doing well, under the Rev. G. Hitchcock, B.A., lately a clergyman of the Establishment, who has accepted the pastorate. He is attracting large congregations every Sunday, and it is hoped that a permanent increase will be made to the membership. As one looks over the province and reviews the condition of the churches, there is, I think, reason for thankfulness and hopefulness.

T. E. M. EDWARDS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham: Smallheath.—The fifth annual meeting of the congregation was held in the Lecture Hall on Saturday, March 4; there was a large attendance of members and friends. The annual report and accounts were read by the Chairman, Mr. Enoch Evans, and adopted. The report detailed the work and many various events that had taken place during the most important and successful year since the congregation was formed. Unanimous votes of thanks were passed to the minister, the Rev. H. Harold Johnson, B.A., and the retiring officers and committee for their services during the past year, the following appointments being made for the ensuing year—namely, hon. secretary, Mr. J. P. P. Duffield; hon. treasurer, Mr. A. Langford; wardens, Mr. J. H. Hinton, Mr. W. Kempson, and fourteen members upon the Vestry committee (one of the latter being a lady, Mrs. A. B. Matthews). The latter part of the meeting partook of a social character.

Burnley.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith terminates his ministry at Trafalgar-street on the last Sunday in April. Since his settlement in July, 1896, the greater part of the heavy debt on the church has been removed, and the membership has gradually increased. Mr. Smith has also been instrumental in the establishment of the North-street Mission-room, where a Sunday-school and regular services are conducted.

Chesterfield.—On Sunday, March 12, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held, when sermons were preached by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., to good congregations. On Monday evening, a largely attended tea meeting took place, at which addresses were delivered by Mr. Tarrant and the minister of the chapel, the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, and a musical entertainment was provided by the choir and friends. It was announced, in the course of the evening, that the whole of the money required to complete the Renovation Fund had now been raised, and the congregation was accordingly free from debt.

Chichester.—At a recent meeting of the Committee of the General Baptist Assembly the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That this Committee desires to offer to Mrs. Spears and family its sincere and respectful sympathy in the loss recently sustained by the death of the Rev. Robert Spears. It very gratefully bears its testimony to his kindly interest in this Assembly and many of its churches, and also records its admiration of his Christian character, his fidelity to conscience, and his unsparing energy in the cause of Christianity as he conceived it."

Choppington.—The congregation here are working for a sale of work, which is to be held next month, the object of which is to raise a sum of at least £50 for the purpose of renovating the interior of the building. To assist in this most laudable enterprise, two concerts have been given by friends from Newcastle-on-Tyne, the first soon after Christmas by Alderman J. Barker-Ellis and party; the second on Saturday evening, March 11, was arranged by the joint hon. secretaries of the N. and D.U.C.A., Messrs. F. C. Slater and E. H. Coysh, and friends. On both occasions the church was crowded to excess. The Sunday-school and Band of Hope are in a very flourishing condition under the management of the Rev. Arthur Harvie, who is assisted by a band of earnest workers.

Cullompton.—Last Sunday evening, the service was conducted by Miss E. Stewart, of Exeter, other friends also driving over to help in the musical part of the service. The sermon had bearing upon the loss sustained by this congregation in the death of Mr. Joseph Hancock, who, though in his eighty-seventh year, had until quite recently been in the habit of walking upwards of two miles to attend the services.

Deal.—The Guild of Good Fellowship connected with the Free Christian Church has concluded a successful session. On March 7 an entertainment was given by Mr. and Mrs. George Chitty and other friends from Dover, the Rev. W. Birks presiding and taking part. On March 13 the Reading Circle held a final meeting, several members contributing recitations and readings.

Gateshead.—Mr. Robert Elliott sends us a heartfelt tribute to the memory of the late Robert Spears, whom he knew forty-eight years ago as the most popular of the preachers who came out from Sunderland to Eighton Banks, a little village where the Rev. George Harris had established a Unitarian mission. Even his Orthodox opponents there confessed that, in their opinion, Mr. Spears was a Christian. In the winter months he lectured on astronomy and other subjects, and on one occasion astonished his audience by arriving in the middle of a severe snow storm, covered with ice and snow, after a walk of eight or nine miles. He insisted on giving the lecture, though only five were present to hear it, and next week had a crowded audience. His work was so much appreciated at Eighton Banks, that the congregation presented Mr. Spears with his portrait, executed by a local artist, a working miner, now in New South Wales. To his old friends he has left the memory of a "most self-sacrificing, loving, Christian man."

Huddersfield.—On Sunday morning last the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached in Fitzwilliam-street Church to a crowded congregation. The Rev. William Mellor, minister, took the devotional part of the service. The congregation of Fitzwilliam-street Church, which was opened in 1846 by Dr. Martineau, are making a vigorous effort to strengthen their financial position. The bazaar, advertisement of which will be found in another column, is to be opened on Wednesday next by Lady O'Hagan, and on the following day by the Mayor of Huddersfield.

Leigh, Lancashire.—On Wednesday, March 8, Mr. F. Eckersley and party gave a grand concert in the schoolroom in aid of the organ fund. There was a large attendance of members and friends, and the concert, which was much appreciated, realised £6 13s. 4d. A vote of thanks to Mr. Eckersley, moved by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, was cordially passed. The organ fund now amounts to £96 5s. 6d.

Northumberland & Durham Lay Preachers' Union.—A meeting of this Association took place in the schoolroom of the Church of Divine Unity on Thursday, the 9th inst., when a stirring address was given by the Rev. James C. Street, who was on a visit to the town. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Frank Walters, interesting remarks were made by several of those present.

Torquay.—Dr. Brooke Herford preached at Unity Hall last Sunday evening to a good congregation, and on Monday evening met the members of the congregation and friends at a tea given by the Women's Society as a farewell to the Rev. Priestley and Mrs. Prime. Dr. Herford spoke a few words relative to Mr. Prime's five years' ministry in Torquay and its uplifting character, which would make the path easier to follow in the future. Mr. Prime also spoke, and a successful impromptu entertainment was given during the evening.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-first Teachers' Conference took place on Saturday afternoon last at Hunslet. There was a goodly number of teachers and friends present, including Sunday-school workers from several of the schools in the Union. Tea having been served in the Joseph-street schoolroom, a meeting was held, the chair being occupied by the Rev. J. G. Slater (Pudsey), the president of the Union. There were also present the Revs. Charles Hargrove, M.A., J. McDowell, W. H. Eastlake, John Boughey, and J. Fox; Messrs. Spence, J. Harrison, E. Hill, Fred Clayton, A. Dalton, E. Jackson, W. Holgate, P. Jackson, Brooks, Baines, B. Ferro and C. H. Boyle (hon. secs.), and others. The President, having extended a most cordial welcome to all present, the Rev. J. McDowell read a paper on "A Course of Study for our Schools," in the course of which he sketched a very comprehensive scheme which he believed might with advantage be adopted, even if modified, in our schools. It embraced lessons from the Bible, and other moral and religious books, along with such lessons on scientific subjects as plainly set forth the infinite goodness of the Creator. The scheme indicated that the subjects should be so graded as to be more in keeping with the ages of the scholars, books and manuals suitable for the various grades being provided by the Sunday School Association in London, where also might be obtained those published by the American Unitarian Sunday School Association. The discussion which followed showed a general feeling of appreciation and sympathy with the object of the paper. The Rev. C. Hargrove moved, Mr. F. Clayton seconded, and it was resolved that the paper be placed before the Union Committee for further consideration of its main principles. Votes of thanks to Mr. McDowell for his excellent paper, and also to the Hunslet friends for their hospitality, having been passed, the conference concluded with singing and prayer.

WANTED, at the end of April, the post of LADY COMPANION; 9 years' experience, and good references.—Address, J. INQUIRER Office, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand.

YOUNG LADY requires engagement as JUNIOR MUSIC MISTRESS in School. Certificated.—Address, W. Vauxhall House, Boston, Lincs.

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood, which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer of the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq. (President of the Provincial Assembly of London and S. E. Counties), Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Tuesday afternoon the National Convention of representatives elected at town's meetings throughout the country in support of the Tsar's Peace Conference was held in St. Martin's Town Hall, under the presidency of Lord Aberdeen. A strong Committee was appointed to take charge of the memorials to Her Majesty's Government and to the Tsar, and a telegram of gratitude to the latter for his beneficent initiative was despatched. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Queen's Hall, the Bishop of London in the chair. The chief speaker was Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P. Mr. John Morley, who was to have spoken, was prevented by illness from being present, and sent a letter of regret, in which he said :—

The recent language of the First Lord of the Admiralty would seem to show that Ministers are hopeful, with the energetic sympathy of the nation at their back, of securing something more solid from the Conference than a mere registration of pious opinions. This at least is certain, that if the Conference does not make international conditions much better, it will leave them much worse. Failure must mean the awakening of new elements of jealousy, soreness and confusion, and this is a reason the more, in addition to a hundred others, why England should bend the whole of her immense strength to render the Conference a practical success. No more glorious aim could inspire a statesman or animate a nation.

The resolution of the evening urged the Government to do all in their power to secure that the deliberations of the Conference may have practical results.

WE beg to call the attention of those of our readers who are interested in Sunday-school work, to the announcement which will be found in another column, of the arrangements now made for a summer session of Sunday-school teachers, from June 30 to July 8, at Manchester College, Oxford. The occasion will be not only delightful as a holiday, affording an opportunity of seeing Oxford, and coming under the spell of its wonderful historical associations, but should also be of great service in wakening a fresh enthusiasm for Sunday-school work and raising the standard of excellence in teaching. We trust that the opportunity will not be neglected, and that in many schools, even in distant parts of the country, the suggestion as to sending at least one representative to Oxford may be carried out.

A PROTEST against the issue of the new Catechism was made at the Liverpool meeting of the Evangelical Free Church Council by Dr. Marshall Randles, of the Didsbury Wesleyan College. The Report of the Council, Dr. Randles said, was a precious pot of ointment, but there was a fly in it—the Catechism. Its eschatology was meagre, and its soteriology superficial. Its definitions of sacrament and church were unsatisfactory. The compilers had undertaken an impossible task, and failure was to be expected. The Catechism gave occasion to say that it was the sum total of the creed of the Free Churches. He doubted if any of them would say that, though the Committee had meant it to be so. What he complained of was that it was undertaken in the name of the Council before the Council had been consulted. If that was democracy he did not understand democracy. He protested against the Catechism being so foisted upon the Council, and was glad of an opportunity of clearing himself of complicity in the matter, although there was much in the Catechism that he approved and believed. The president explained that the Catechism was not intended to be a representation of the creed of the churches composing the Council, and time only could show whether it was valuable or unimportant.

THE Wesleyans of Burnley do not seem to be altogether satisfied with their position in regard to the local Free Church Council. It will be remembered that Unitarians are admitted to fellowship in the Burnley Council, and that before the growth of the Federation movement, the Wesleyans also joined heartily in the union of all the Nonconformist churches of the town. Then came a new superintendent of the Wesleyan circuit, "with a strong antipathy to the Unitarian school of thought," and the Wesleyan members were withdrawn from the Council. Pressure from the executive of the National Council only led to a stronger determination on the part of the other Burnley Nonconformists to hold together, even though their refusal to expel their Unitarian brethren shut them out from the National Union. The Burnley Gazette recently published an address to the Young Men's Class of the Fulleage Wesleyan Sunday-school, by a former teacher, giving expression to the dissatisfaction of local Wesleyans, and urging that they ought again to send representatives to the Burnley Council, and take their part in the vigorous work for the moral and social regeneration of the town in which the Council is engaged.

FOLLOWING on this address, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, the Unitarian minister at Burnley, preached on Sunday week a special sermon on the subject, which was also fully reported in the Burnley Gazette. Having paid a tribute to John Wesley, specially emphasising the Catholicity of his spirit, Mr. Smith contrasted with this the present attitude of official Wesleyanism, and recounted the story of the Burnley Council, welcoming the protest which had come from some of their Wesleyan brethren. The work in which they were engaged, he said, was such that they might forget their doctrinal differences in a common spirit of Christian helpfulness :—

"In all public movements what is needed to-day is a practical Christianity, the influence of which shall smite heavily the falseness, corruption, and evils existing around us. Christianity is wanted in the world, as well as in the church, so that it may be easier for men and women to dare to do that which is right. He serves God best who best serves his fellow man; for, when party differences and sectarian names are forgotten in a Christlike service to humanity, righteousness will increase, faith in God become a mightier power, and religion regulate more and more all that concerns the life of man in this busy world."

THREE Social Crusaders, Messrs. Stitt Wilson, Wise and Hollingsworth, Methodist Episcopal ministers, who have come over from America, are conducting an eight days' mission in the Brotherhood Church, Southgate-road, N., of which Mr. Bruce Wallace is the minister. Mr. Stitt Wilson is to preach there to-morrow morning. His message is of scientific socialism, based upon the ethical and spiritual teaching of Christ. He gave up his pulpit and salary in Chicago a little while ago, and with the full sympathy of his wife took rooms in the slums of that city, where he is brought into close and brotherly sympathy with the people and preaches his gospel in the streets. "What would Jesus do?" is the question he desires to answer, and his protest is against the "unjust, unbrotherly and cruel competitive system of industry and commerce in which we are all entangled."

A CORRESPONDENT, who has heard Mr. Stitt Wilson at the Brotherhood Church, speaks of his great earnestness and eloquence, and of the broad-minded practical view he takes of religion. Those of our readers who have been interested in "In His Steps," may be glad of an opportunity of hearing a real social reformer from Chicago. Mr. Stitt Wilson and his companions will shortly be in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and are to go further north, into Scotland. Our correspondent desires that he should be heard also in Unitarian pulpits. Mr. Wilson's headquarters are at Mansfield House, Cannigg Town, E.

In his address as President of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches at Liverpool, Dr. Mackennal made a touching reference to the late Dr. Charles Berry, the first President of the Council. Having referred to his overmastering faith in the Church as a Divine Society, the very Body of Christ, Dr. Mackennal said:—

His greatest service was the quickening of the consciousness of the Free Churches, throughout England, that they stand in living relation to their living Head. His affection and his influence went out beyond the Free Churches; reunion in England, the reunion of Christendom for the sake of the world was his final object; he believed that this could never come about through a sacerdotal society or a State church, and so his work for this end was wrought in association with us. His vivacity and devotedness were as marked in committee, and in private conversation, he displayed here the same ardent enthusiasm, as in public speech. From him came the first suggestion that we should drop the name of Congress and associate ourselves as a Council; and he never forgot the Council he so largely helped to form, nor flagged in his fidelity to it. What he did you all know; the cost at which he did it was gradually revealed to his more intimate associates, who saw, with mingled alarm and admiration, that his life was being "poured out on the sacrifice and service of our faith." Before his speech, last March, on his American mission, I saw him distressfully leaning on the back of a pew; I knew, from my reading, what are the pangs of angina pectoris, and my heart was moved. I would have spared him; but he would not spare himself. He suffered for the cause which has brought us here to-day; devotion to this service has shortened his days. We can but grieve that we have lost such a leader, so dear a friend. Faith takes our sorrow, and turns it into gratitude. "Thanks be to God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest through us the savour of His knowledge in every place."

THE Rev. J. A. Spurgeon, brother of the late Charles Spurgeon, died suddenly on Wednesday, in a Croydon train. Their father, the Rev. John Spurgeon, formerly minister of a Congregational church, is still living. Dr. Spurgeon was president-elect of the Baptist Union. Educated at Regent's Park College, after pastorates at Southampton and Bayswater, he became assistant to his more famous brother at the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Since 1869 he has been minister of a Baptist church at Croydon, but was to the end closely associated with the Stockwell Orphanage, and took a deep interest in all the work connected with the Tabernacle.

TO REMEMBER TO FORGET.

WE remember some things which we ought to forget, and forget some things which we ought to remember. Perhaps we have hardly reflected that the word "ought" can properly come in here. The memory seems to be so passive, or its action so automatic, that we have overlooked the part played by the will. Yet it is a voluntary thing to give attention, to recall events and revel in the recollection, or to try at least to dismiss them from our thoughts. When things are of a nature best forgotten, why should we cherish them and bear a grudge? It is not wise to keep in mind even our own misdoings, beyond the point necessary for apology and amendment. We need not make our lives miserable with perpetual regrets, any more than we need torment the body by wearing a hair-shirt. Then, do let us allow our neighbours and acquaintances to forget the little faults, mistakes, and slips which they committed years ago. There are some people who will remember wherein you annoyed them, and throw it at you ten years afterwards. Thorns grew in your field; and they gathered some and preserved them to prick you with. When they bring one out for use, they remark: "I have a very good memory: I can forgive, but I cannot forget!" The fact is that they do neither, and that they might do both if they tried. The tendency of all mental impressions is to fade, and they are hardly likely to remain as vivid pictures unless they are often recalled and dwelt upon with satisfaction.

In looking back over the past we remember our pleasures better than we remember our pains. The old soldier will recall the battle and the joy of victory, and forget the pain he suffered from his wounds. Our memory of the winter, when it is past, will be more of the pleasant evenings by the cosy fire than of the nipping frost we sometimes felt outside. Delightful experiences are repeated by recollection and enjoyed over again. Ever dangers, difficulties and alarms may yield a pleasure in the retrospect, because they were surmounted. The anxiety of a voyage is forgotten sooner than the joy of reaching home, and the pain of an operation sooner than the restored power and the sense of triumph in regaining it. This seems to be Nature's gracious way. When we do not foolishly frustrate it by cherishing our griefs and nursing our grievances.

It is not intended, of course, that all the past should be forgotten. Yesterday must be remembered if we are to do the work of to-day; and past years must be within recollection, in order to keep the thread of life connected. It is the same, of course, with the nation and its life; and in the life of the nation also there are incidents which are best forgotten. The Israelites once, in looking backward, remembered the fish, the cucumbers, the melons, and the garlic which they enjoyed in Egypt, while they forgot the whip of the taskmaster and the hardship of having to make bricks without straw. They might have recalled the feast of fish and melons for the sake of adding to the pleasures of the present hour, but what they chose to do was to make comparisons, to feed their discontent. Then, said they, we had good food and great variety, but now we have only this manna day after day. Why were we not left undisturbed in Egypt? The former times were better than these! Thus they compare the best features of the past with the worst of the present, not thinking that to see either past or present clearly they should see it whole. They were not to blame for remembering in the desert how they had feasted in Egypt; but they forgot the slavery and the strangling of the children. In the desert, fish were not to be caught, nor melons grown, and Moses could not spread his people a good table; but he had given them freedom and a better law. If we were to have the past over again we must have it in its entirety. It is very unfair to our leaders when we compare the best things of the past with the worst things of the present, and complain that we are badly governed or guided or provided for,

G. ST. CLAIR.

THOMAS PARGETER'S (OF FOXCOTE) CHARITY.—The annual meeting of the trustees of this charity was held at the offices of Messrs. Harding and Goode, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, on Monday, the 20th inst., the Rev. Joseph Wood in the chair, the other trustees present being the Revs. Henry Eachus, E. D. Priestley Evans, E. P. Hall, Henry McKean, J. Hardinge Matthews, A. H. Shelley, and A. W. Timmis. The following were appointed officers of the Trust for the ensuing year:—The Rev. L. P. Jacks, chairman; the Revs. Henry McKean and A. W. Timmis, auditors; Mr. F. H. Jordan (manager of Lloyds' Bank, Limited, Temple-row, Birmingham), treasurer; and Mr. Charles Harding, secretary. The business was principally of a formal character. The few vacancies which have occurred since the last annual meeting have from time to time been supplied from a very large and increasing number of applicants. The number of annuitants at present receiving aid from the Charity is 107. The special characteristic of this Trust is that it enjoins that primary attention should be given those applicants who have had the education and occupied the position of gentlemen, but who have become reduced in circumstances.

REVIVING cordial: of good temper, 3 grains; of bright cheerfulness, 3 grains; of humility, 3 grains. Mix all with a few drops of the spirit of love and thoughtfulness for others, and pour out to your friends on dark and cloudy days. The effect will be marvellous, and must be seen to be believed.—Heather and Harebell.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.—Cocoa-Nib Extract (Tea-like).—The choicest roasted nibs (broken up beans) of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—"James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London."

ARNOBIUS.—III.

ARNOBIUS was a convert to Christianity, and shortly after his conversion he wrote or spoke against the heathen religion in which he formerly believed. "Lately I worshipped images" (I. c. 39). Of his antecedents we know but little. His work shows that he was a man of culture and of wide reading. Jerome informs us that he was a famous rhetorician and teacher of rhetoric. He had been "a persistent enemy of Christ," and probably used against the Christians those arguments which he has answered so successfully. There is no reason to doubt, however, that he was, for the time, honest in his adhesion to his former faith, and not a conformist in opposition to his better convictions. Whether his moral life was tainted with the corruption of Sicca Veneria, it is impossible to say. I read the other day of a critic who declared that the Confessions of Augustine interested him very much up to the date of his conversion. And I once overheard a criticism on a revivalist preacher: "You did not hear so-and-so to-day; you would have liked him, he has been a bad man." I am glad to say such critics as these cannot find anything in the career of Arnobius to gratify their peculiar taste. For myself, I trust that he was one of a very large number of people who lead decent and sober lives, even in the midst of the most dissolute society, and of whose existence the muse of history is apt to take no account.

It may be well for us to consider what is implied when it is said that Arnobius was converted to Christianity. Our first impression would naturally be that he was convinced of the truth of the doctrines taught by the Christian Church at the time of his conversion. Accordingly, we find that a French Roman Catholic writer, M. L'Abbé J. B. Glaire, describes the treatise of Arnobius as an "eloquent work in which he defends the principal points of our religion" (Dictionnaire Universel de Sciences Ecclésiastiques).

The assumption that conversion to Christianity implied an adhesion to the orthodox doctrines is shown to be a hasty one, from the fact that the Octavius of Minucius Felix converts Cæcilius to Christianity by an argument in which no special doctrine, except the Deity of Christ, is mentioned; and the convert postpones, till the next day, a training in the fuller belief of its mysteries. The assertion that, in the particular case of Arnobius, he was converted to orthodox Christianity is not borne out by the facts of the case.

Arnobius certainly did not believe in the authority of antiquity. "The credibility of a religion must not be determined by its age, but by its divinity, and you should consider not when, but what, you began to worship" (II. c. 71). "Our system is more ancient, you say, therefore, most credible and trustworthy; as if antiquity were not the most fertile source of errors. Could not falsehoods have been both spoken and believed ten thousand years ago, or is it not most probable that that which is near to our own time should be more credible than that which is separated by a long term of years?" (I. c. 57.)

Arnobius believed in the Absolute Unity of the Supreme God who is "the first Cause—in whom created things exist—who is illimitable, unbegotten, immortal, enduring before all, God Himself alone, whom no bodily shape may represent, no outline delineate" (I. c. 31.)

It follows from this belief that, if there be gods in the secondary sense of the word, "their lives are derived from the Supreme and dependent on Him" (I. c. 28). Christ is put into this category by Arnobius; and, when he speaks of Christ as "a god in reality" (I. c. 42), we must understand that the author claims that Christ is worthy to be classed among the secondary gods, not that he is to be identified with the Supreme. Indeed he distinctly says of Christ: "He took upon him the form of man . . . so that he might speak and teach; and, without encroaching on the sovereignty and government of the King Supreme, might carry out all those objects for the accomplishment of which he had come into the world" (I. c. 60). Arnobius, certainly, did not believe in the orthodox version of the Incarnation. This is obvious from what he says of Æsculapius: "He was by no means divine, who was conceived and born from a woman's womb, who had, by yearly stages, reached that term of life at which a thunderbolt drove him at once from life and light" (VII. c. 44). But if Christ was not, and could not be, born of a woman, it follows that there was no Virgin Mary, the Mother of God. Arnobius lived before the doctrine of the Christian Trinity had been fully developed. But he used arguments which might well be employed to refute that doctrine. "It cannot be, in the nature of things, that what is one should become two; and that unity, which is naturally uncompounded, should divide and go into separate things" (IV. c. 37). He contends that the theory that the world is a single animal, and moves from the impulse of one mind, precludes the belief that there are gods presiding over parts of the universe. "For as one man cannot, while his body remains entire, be divided into many men; nor can many men while they continue to be distant and separate from each other, be fixed into one sentient individual, so if the world is a single animal, and moves from the impulse of one mind, neither can it be dispersed in several deities; nor, if the gods be part of it, can they be brought together and changed into one living creature with unity of feeling throughout all its parts" (III. c. 35).

"Some of your learned men maintain that Diana, Ceres, Luna, are but one diety in triple union; and that there are not three distinct persons, as there are three different names; that in all these Luna is invoked, and that the others are a series of surnames added to her name. But if this is sure, again is Ceres but an empty name and Diana" (III. c. 34). "When you maintain that Bacchus, Apollo, the sun are one diety seemingly increased in number by the use of three names, is not the number of the gods lessened? For if it is true that the sun is also Bacchus and Apollo, there can consequently be in the universe no Apollo or Bacchus" (III. c. 33).

It is possible to draw up from the writings of Arnobius an argument against both the fact of the Atonement through the sacrifice of Christ and the doctrines generally associated with it. In the first place, Arnobius is far from regarding sin as an infinite evil. "Natural infirmity, and not the choice of his desire or of his sober judgment, makes a sinner" (I. c. 49). Arnobius does not mention the Fall of Man as recorded in the Book of Genesis. The idea that the Supreme Being, or any of the gods who derive their existence from the Supreme Being (if there be such), can be angry is altogether opposed to the philosophy of Arnobius. If they are angry, it shows that they are not the true gods. "The true gods neither conceive anger nor indulge a grudge, nor contrive by insidious devices what may be hurtful" (I. c. 23). Moreover, such anger would be fatal to their immortality. "For wherever, as the philosophers hold, there is any agitation, there of necessity passion must exist. Where passion is situated, it is reasonable that mental excitement follow. Where there is mental excitement, there grief and sorrow exist. Where grief and sorrow exist, there is already room for weakening and decay; and if these two harass them, extinction is at hand—namely, death, which ends all things, and takes away life from every sentient being" (I. c. 18).

Arnobius protests most emphatically against the injustice of making the innocent suffer for the guilty. "Can any man believe that he is a god who is so unjust, so impious, and who does not observe even the laws of men among whom it would be held a great crime to punish one for another, and to avenge one man's offences upon the necks of others?" (VII. c. 43.) "Should it be considered at all just, Jupiter"—says the speaking ox—"that when another has sinned I should be killed; or that you should allow satisfaction to be made to you with my blood, although I never did you wrong?" (VII. c. 9.) If the magistrate neglected his duty when presiding over the games so as to call forth divine retribution, what had the unhappy people done that they should, in their own persons, suffer the penalty of another's offences, and should be forced to hurry out of life by contagious pestilences? Nay, what had the women, whose weakness did not allow them to take part in public business, the grown-up maidens, the little boys, finally the young children, yet dependent for food on their nurses—what had these done that they should be assailed with equal, with the same, severity, and that before they tasted the joy of life they should feel the bitterness of death?" (VII. c. 42).

"The idea that a sacrifice of a god whose goodness is kindred to the divine goodness is likely to be efficacious, is virtually ridiculed in the passage (V. c. 22) in which it is said in effect:—You sacrifice a virgin heifer to a virgin goddess. You do honour to the principle of virginity in the goddess by taking away the life of a virgin. That is, to say the least, a queer thing to do. But supposing that the principle is a right one, then you should sacrifice musicians to Apollo, because he is a musician; you should sacrifice physicians to Æsculapius because he is a physician; you should sacrifice artificers to Vulcan, and the most eloquent and fluent to Mercury. Which is absurd. (If the worst instead of the best were sacrificed, perhaps there would be something to be said in favour of this plan.) He does not go on to say that the sacrifice of a god-like being to the Supreme God is not to be thought of, though his argument might very well have been extended from the intellectual to the moral and spiritual.

CHARLES C. COE,

(To be concluded.)

THE PHILOSOPHICAL MAGAZINES.

THE January number of the International Journal of Ethics contains more than the average amount of interesting and important matter. It opens with a thoughtful article by Mr. T. J. Lawrence, of Downing College, Cambridge, on "The Tsar's Rescript." How far the Tsar's suggestion admits of realisation depends upon whether the public sentiment against the settlement of disputes by war is strong enough to give effective support to the proposals of enlightened legislators:—

If public opinion proves strong enough to force statesmen into devising a workable plan for preventing the further increase of armaments, it will probably be strong enough to stop any attempt to persevere in a proved breach of the agreement arrived at. We are thus brought back to our original position. The success or failure of the Tsar's scheme depends on the amount of enlightened sentiment that can be rallied in its support. Without being unduly despondent on the one hand or foolishly sanguine on the other, we may wish the young ruler of Russia "God-speed" in his difficult undertaking. "Boys," said General Sherman to a corps of cadets, "they tell you that war is all glory. But let me tell you it is all hell." The man who can persuade the nations to take the first step in the abatement of hell will be crowned with immortal honour, and win a conspicuous place in the list of those who have conferred lasting benefits on humanity.

Another striking article is that by Professor J. S. Mackenzie on "The Idea of Progress." The chief aim of this paper is to combat the doctrine, urged by Mr. Benjamin Kidd and others, that the rational principle in man is always a principle of self-love. As Professor Mackenzie points out, even Bishop Butler, though he wrote as an opponent of Hobbes's selfish system of morals, yet held that "when we sit down in a cool hour" it seems unreasonable to aim at anything else than our individual happiness. But, argues Professor Mackenzie, if we understand self-love in Aristotle's sense as meaning the effort to develop what is highest in our own individual nature, and so to secure the richest form of happiness, it seems clear that this is inseparable from the realisation of the most complete form of social welfare. "The effort after the kind of welfare that we reasonably seek for ourselves—the development of our most important powers—fits in with and is perfectly compatible with the effort after the same kind of welfare that we reasonably seek for others." It appears to us, however, that it makes a most important difference—all the difference, indeed, between Aristotle's view and the view of Jesus of Nazareth—whether we pursue the good of others purely for its own sake, or whether we pursue it as a means for the richer realisation of our own happiness. Whenever self-enrichment or self-realisation in any form becomes the dominant aim, as it seems to have become at times even in so great a man as Goethe, the highest ethical condition is not reached, nor is the greatest spiritual blessedness attained. In the "Discussions" of this number, Dr. S. H. Mellone ably defends his "Studies in Philosophical Criticism and Construction" from an unjust attack upon the book by the Hegelian Mr. R. A. Duff, of Glasgow University. While Mr. Duff practically treats each rational soul as having no really separate and independent existence, Dr. Mellone forcibly, and, in our view, most rightly, insists that "the finite and growing self, the individual, must have a reality of its own; while at the same time it is vitally related to the deeper unity which is the Absolute."

While there are several articles in the October and January numbers of Mind which are of value to readers specially trained in philosophy and psychology, there is in the October number a long paper by Professor D. G. Ritchie, read before the Aristotelian Society, of which Professor Ritchie is now the President, on "The One and the Many," which is of considerable interest to theologians. In it Professor Ritchie brings out clearly the distinction between the two very different fundamental conceptions of the universe which are now contending for mastery in the minds of the more thoughtful philosophical and religious thinkers. The difference between these two basal philosophical theories becomes particularly conspicuous when the question is asked, How are the will and the moral development of each individual man related to the will and purpose of that Supreme Being from whom the universe derives its existence and its unity? In other words, Is what is called Sin a real and absolute discord in God's world, or is it merely an appearance of discord which, if we could see the whole as God sees it, would be no discord at all, but rather a particular phase in an evolving universe, every feature of which is an inevitable and indispensable factor in a grand and perfectly harmonious cosmos? Professor Ritchie, as a Hegelian idealist, adopts this latter view, and, therefore, he will not allow that the individual self possesses any such independent causality as would enable it in seasons of temptation to freely choose between obeying and resisting what it feels to be the will of the indwelling God. Hence, in the view of Professor Ritchie, every one of a man's moral decisions is necessary, and all alike, whether virtuous or sinful, are needful elements in the gradual establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. Such thinkers, on the other hand, as Dr. Martineau and Professor W. James contend that consciousness unmistakably testifies to the fact that men in the exercise of their moral freedom may either further or retard the victory of truth, love and righteousness on earth. Such thinkers see in conscious sin an activity of the human soul which God neither originates nor approves. With Oliver Wendell Holmes they say:—

Our midnight is thy smile withdrawn,
Our noontide is thy gracious dawn,
Our rainbow arch thy mercy's sign,
All save the clouds of sin are thine!

Professor Ritchie's chief objection to the admission of the real freedom of the human will is thus expressed:—"If we picture God as making man with free-will and then looking on to see what happens, ignorant of the result, there is conceivably a more powerful and more prescient being who knows what will happen as the result of the first God's action. This latter being is therefore God." But surely Professor Ritchie is here misstating the real issue. If God does not foresee the way in which man will in every emergency use his moral freedom, it is simply because He, for the attainment of higher ends, has voluntarily limited in some small degree His own prescience. If man was to have real freedom and moral responsibility it was absolutely necessary that he should have true power of choice in the moral crises of his life; and, so far as we are able to see, it was as impossible that God should give to man freedom, and yet at the same time should foresee how in every instance he would use this freedom as it would be for God to construct a triangle whose three angles should not be equal to two right-angles. The real question is, Which is the more desirable and the more perfect universe—a universe in which true moral freedom and moral accountability are absent, and in which, therefore, there is no possibility of real inter-personal relations between God and man, or a universe in which personal intercourse between God and man is a reality, and in which, therefore, antagonism to God's will is possible and actual? The first kind of universe would probably be the more satisfactory to us if we had no other faculty than the intellectual faculty; but the second kind of universe is the only universe which is adequate to satisfy our whole nature, including the higher claims of our moral and spiritual life.

In the October number of Mind there is also an excellent critical notice of Mr. J. M. Baldwin's "Social and Ethical Interpretations in Mental Development," by Helen Bosanquet; while the January number contains a very lucid and thorough review, by Dr. G. D. Hicks, of the first part of Dr. Paul Barth's important work on "Die Philosophie der Geschichte als Sociologie."

The first article in the November number of The Philosophical Review is a very noteworthy paper by Professor James Seth on "Scottish Moral Philosophy," which paper formed the author's inaugural address on his assuming the post of Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. The following passage will show how very close is the affinity between Professor Seth's ethical theory and that of Dr. Martineau:—

The Scottish philosophers shared with Socrates and Aristotle and Butler their reverence for the "plain man's" conscience, for the uncorrupted testimony of the human heart. And perhaps we need to be reminded of this ultimate touchstone of ethical truth no less than the contemporaries of the founders of Scottish philosophy. Perhaps we are even more in love with "system" than they, and need to be taught that the true method of ethics is not the metaphysical method of German idealism which deduces an ethical theory from "the nature of things," but the more modest and scientific method of our own countrymen—English as well as Scottish, with very few exceptions—which bases its theory of morals upon the facts of "human nature," and prefers to remain unsystematic and incomplete rather than sacrifice to the demands of systematic completeness a single element of moral experience.

The chief feature in the January number of this journal is the opening paper in which President J. G. Schurman, who is one of the ablest among the expositors and critics of the Kantian philosophy, discusses "Kant's Theory of the A Priori Forms of Sense." As usual, the reviews of new books and the valuable summaries of the chief articles in other English and foreign philosophical magazines give a special value to this journal.

The Monist for January opens with an instructive paper on "Ormazd; or, the ancient Persian idea of 'God,'" illustrated by interesting drawings from the remains of Persian sculpture, dating from the time of King Darius. There is also a suggestive paper by Professor C. Lloyd Morgan on "Vitalism," which indicates a via media between the old theory of a separate vital principle in organisms and the other extreme which seeks to explain life wholly by mechanics and chemistry.

The theological reader will be attracted by two long "Discussions," in one of which Judge C. H. Chase criticises Dr. Paul Carus's view of the nature of "The Soul and God," while in the other Mr. W. E. Wilkinson questions the soundness of Dr. Carus's account of the "Personality of God." In the same number, Dr. Carus replies to these two critics; but we think that most of our readers who are tempted to look through these able "Discussions" will agree with us that Judge Chase especially has indicated certain great weaknesses in Dr. Carus's philosophy of religion—weaknesses which, in our view, Dr. Carus's rejoinder rather exposes more fully than removes.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

OXFORD NOTES.

THE term has come to its close with that kind of surprise which is the consequence of a spell of solid work carrying the days swiftly along; under the reign of St. Hilary, men seem to bend to the task with more than usual seriousness. The release from lectures is a welcome change; the hard-worked professor flies to his own special vocation—the book he is writing, the researches he longs to be at, the collections to be arranged; the student or under grad.—well, he is youthful, let us not expect too much in the coming five weeks. He takes some books "down" and says he is going to read. We wish him the joy of his studies, they will tell in the exams. at the beginning of next term. But the post-graduate knows that this vacation is his opportunity.

Manchester College has offered sterling subjects to outsiders as well as to its students during the past two months; besides the usual curriculum there have been four courses of lectures open to the public, two of them term-long. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter in Comparative Religion, which he has made his special study, spoke on "Ideas of Revelation" in the past; the Dunkin lecturer, Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, in this division of his sessional work on Sociology, discoursed learnedly on "The Value and Cost of Production"; among other hearers at both of these, two or three members of the new Ruskin Hall tried their wings. At the end of January Dr. R. H. Charles, Professor of Biblical Greek in Oxford, gave in three afternoons a valuable historical sketch of "The Doctrine of the Last Things in Israel and Judah," eschatology being a subject in which he is peculiarly at home; and in February Mr. W. A. Shaw, who is editing the Records of the Presbyterian Classis of Lancashire for the Chetham Society, spent three other afternoons in describing the state of the Church under the Commonwealth—Presbytery, Independency, and their attempted reforms. These two sets we owe to the Hibbert trustees. The other College activities are fully alive, such as the debating society and the Martineau Club—at the last meeting of which Dr. H. Rashdall read a paper on "The Ethics of Forgiveness," which called forth keen discussion. In these discussions our Indian students, with their analytical intellects and power of speech, are not behind.

Not to forget the amenities of life, one need but mention the bi-terminal evening meetings of the "Social Union," when the famous cup of tea plays its part between members of the College and the congregation that worships in their chapel, and the delightful Sunday afternoons over Browning at Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter's house, shared by some privileged guests. Last, but not least, we have actually had a wedding—Miss Odgers having the distinction of being the first to be married in our College chapel; and very charming it was in that beautiful place. The chapels of Mansfield and Manchester Colleges are probably the only college chapels in Oxford where weddings are celebrated.

The recent annual report of the Charles-street Institute showed good work done by some of our small community amidst the Oxford poor: Sunday-school classes and Sunday evening services have been maintained in spite of difficulties; while other classes, mothers' meetings, &c., show a healthy life. Many of the Manchester College students take an active interest in this Institute, which, although sadly short of funds and necessarily suffering from the intermittent nature of Oxford life, is progressing steadily in a quiet way.

The University, marching with the times, is enlarging its boundaries in the direction of geography; an extensive scheme for the teaching and study of which necessary science, under a combined committee of the delegates and of the Royal Geographical Society, is under consideration. The importance of a well-founded plan in this subject to the interests of general education in England can hardly be over-rated. The scheme for conferring diplomas in education by the University has worked so well that it has just been continued for a further five years.

As to the women students, now so settled a part of Oxford life, they are flourishing and not unworthily pursue their schools of Economics, History, and English; in their halls may also be heard occasional well-known speakers on various themes, such as Mr. Halstead on "Labour Co-operation," Miss Kingsley on "West Africa," and Mr. F. C. Conybeare on the "Dreyfus Case," &c., showing that womanly sympathies are not asleep in college.

What may prove to be an event was the sudden descent into Oxford in the winter vacation of the Ruskin Hall idea, and the opening of its house on Feb. 22 for twenty or thirty select working-men—as a beginning—from various places, for whom courses of instruction are provided in History, Political Science, Science and Sociology. The promoter, an American "born orator" from the Far West, had a warm greeting at the large public meeting at which he explained his plans. The University, as might be expected, quietly stands aloof, not hindering, but not helping. The two poles of aims and ideals cannot quickly amalgamate. But there are several who privately wish him well.

It takes a soul to move a body, it takes a high-souled man to move the masses; it takes the ideal to blow an inch inside the dust of the actual: and your Fouriers failed, because not poets enough to understand that life develops from within.—E. B. Browning.

SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS AT OXFORD.

A LETTER from Mr. Ion Pritchard, secretary of the Sunday-school Association, appeared in our columns some little time ago, announcing that in accordance with a suggestion in the Helper of this year it had been arranged, with the hearty co-operation of the Principals and Professors of Manchester College, to hold a summer session for Sunday-school teachers at Oxford.

Mr. Pritchard has now issued a further letter to our Sunday-schools throughout the country, definitely announcing that the session will commence on the last day of June (a Friday), and asking for a return of the teachers and others who will attend. The following particulars as to the session are given:—

The object of this gathering is—1st, to endeavour to raise the ideal of Sunday-school teaching by infusing that enthusiasm which naturally results from the union of those who have interests in common; and by the devotion of a certain time to the study of subjects bearing upon their work. 2nd, to give the members the opportunity for visiting the colleges and other places of interest in Oxford, and for meeting together in friendly intercourse.

Persons Eligible.—Teachers and ministers connected with our Sunday-schools, or young people who are about to take up the work. Also friends in Oxford interested in the scheme.

Applications.—These should be made by the intending visitors, and must reach Mr. Pritchard at Essex Hall not later than May 31. A deposit of 5s. to be sent with the advice note, which sum will be exchanged, on the member's arrival in Oxford, for five luncheon tickets.

Time of Meeting.—The session will begin on Friday, June 30, and will extend to Saturday, July 8. Members should arrive on Thursday evening, so as to arrange as to their lodgings and to begin work on the following morning. A time-table will be printed and forwarded on application, in order that members unable to spare time for the whole course may select that portion which they prefer.

Expenses.—It is estimated that the cost of board and lodging (including mid-day meal in common) need not exceed 30s. for the whole session, or 25s. for the week. The local secretary, Mr. J. H. Woods, B.A., will arrange for the finding of rooms, &c.

Plan of Proceedings.—Two lectures will be given each morning.

The first series will comprise the following:—

"On the Old Testament" (two lectures), Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A.; "The Relation of Ethics to Religious Belief," Rev. C. B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc.; "Paul and his Epistles" (two lectures), Principal James Drummond, M.A., LL.D.; "The Historical Development of Liberal Nonconformity" (two lectures), Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A.

The second series is not yet quite completed, but the following are promised:—

"On Discipline," Rev. H. Rawlings, M.A.; "How to Teach the Bible," Rev. Joseph Wood; "What can we teach, and how," Miss Marian Pritchard; "The Object and Method of S. S. Teaching," Rev. J. J. Wright; "Method of Preparing and Presenting a Lesson," Miss Edith Drummond.

After the morning session, the members will have their mid-day meal together, and the afternoon will be left free for visits to colleges and other places of interest.

Two or three of the evenings will be devoted to discussions, on one a conversation will be held, and on another there will be an exhibition of lantern slides belonging to the Rev. J. E. Odgers, of Christian Antiquities, Catacombs, Early Churches; also a set illustrating "The Story of Religion in England."

On Sunday afternoon, July 2, the children of the Mission School will be divided into three classes (infants, children from eight to twelve, and from twelve to sixteen), and to each a model lesson will be given, at which a few visitors will be able to be present.

Superintendents are requested to bring the matter under the notice of their teachers without delay, and it is hoped that there will be a large response, which will ensure a successful gathering. Where there is difficulty as to the cost of such a visit to Oxford, it is suggested that friends of a school should unite to defray the expenses of a representative, who might be sent up as a delegate, and afterwards give some account of the meetings to his school.

THE REV. S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS IN CALCUTTA.

REFERRING to the arrival of Mr. Williams in Calcutta (on Sunday, Jan. 15) from Madras, The Interpreter, the organ of Babu Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, says:—"Almost all Brahmos in Calcutta welcome Mr. Fletcher Williams with open arms. As Mr. Williams has come for three years, we shall have plenty to say of him by-and-by. But in the course of our short acquaintance we find him possessed of many of those important qualities which his somewhat delicate work will demand in this country. In the first place, as a Unitarian worker, he must count on little sympathy from his Anglo-Indian countrymen, whether clerical or lay; perhaps he must expect a good deal of opposition secret or open. In the second place, there is not much Unitarian Christianity in this country, and he will have to create it if he can. In the third place, the differences in the Brahmo Somaj, with whom he must mainly work, are so many, though frivolous, that he will have to steer his course with the utmost carefulness. But Mr. Williams is a just, capable, and sympathetic man. He is a preacher and lecturer of talent. We are told by an English friend that in London he has had a reputation even outside his own denomination. We hope he will find ample opportunity of successful work among all classes of Indians."

A public welcome was accorded to Mr. Williams in the City College. Mr. Mozoomdar presided, and representatives of all the Brahmo societies in Calcutta—the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, the Adi Somaj, and the two sections of the New Dispensation Church—joined in cordial greetings.

In connection with the anniversaries of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj at the end of January, when congregations of at least 1,000 people assembled for some ten days in succession, crowding the Mandir, Mr. Williams delivered three discourses; and to the anniversary meeting of the Students'

Association he gave his lecture on "Carlyle." At the annual meeting of the Brahmo Somaj of India, held at Peace Cottage, the residence of Mr. Mozoomdar, Mr. Williams delivered an address on "Unitarianism." Referring to this The World and the New Dispensation says:—"It is not too much to say that Mr. Williams took the assembled Brahmos at the meeting by an agreeable and grateful surprise. His address all through was in such a vein of earnestness and reality, his enthusiasm so charming and contagious, the sympathy and solicitude he evinced for the Brahmo Somaj, so deep felt and profound, that they looked upon Mr. Williams as a brother in faith, and not a stranger and guest. His lecture contained a highly instructive account of the ideals and efforts of the Unitarian body in England, and closed with an exhortation to the Brahmos to strive for unity and co-operation among themselves."

Mr. Williams has lectured to the University Institute on "Matthew Arnold," when there was a crowded audience; to the Students' Association of the Sadharan Brahmo Somaj on "Agnosticism," "Channing," and "Theodore Parker." The Indian Messenger says that "his account of the principles that influenced the conduct of Channing throughout life, especially his high sense of the dignity of human nature, was truly elevating. We trust Mr. Williams' lecture has awakened in many bosoms a fresh desire to read Channing once again." At the City College a lecture on "Emerson" has been given, and on this Unity and the Minister says:—"Whoever has heard Mr. Williams' addresses has been gratified with his eloquence, erudition, and liberal views on religious matters. His lectures are treats to educated Bengalis, who come in large numbers to listen to his utterances."

At the City College Mr. Williams holds a class in theology; on Sunday mornings conducts an English service, with sermon for natives and Europeans, at the Dalhousie Institute; and on Sunday evenings preaches at the meeting of the Bhowanipore Brahmo Somaj. He was one of the speakers at a very successful reunion of teachers, students, and ex-students of the City College, when there was an audience numbering more than a thousand persons.

OBITUARY.

REV. J. W. LAKE.

ON Tuesday last week the Rev. John William Lake, in his seventy-sixth year, passed peacefully away at his Margate home. Mr. Lake was born in London in the year 1823, and was educated at Christ's Hospital. He became a medical student at Westminster Hospital, and in 1858 took his diploma of L.S.A., which qualified him to practice as a doctor. He established himself in Boston, Lincolnshire, where, in addition to his medical profession, he entered in 1859 on the ministry of the Spain-lane Chapel. He had been brought up in connection with the Church of England, but adopted Unitarian views, chiefly through the influence of William Cullen Bryant's poetry.

In 1862 he removed to Warwick and took charge of the High-street pulpit there, and his ministry at this place continued for thirty-one years. During the same period, he for twenty-five years, conducted services also at Kenilworth, and gave many series of Sunday evening lectures in Leamington. These were greatly appreciated, and for the most part attracted large audiences; but they were brought to a close by the refusal of the hall. No man was better known at Warwick or Leamington, and none more highly esteemed and respected than Mr. Lake. His voice was ever lifted up for truth, justice, and progress. One sermon which he preached at Warwick in the cause of justice to the poor will ever be remembered. Mr. Lake was a careful student and an original thinker. For a considerable period he published a serial paper to advocate reform in the English Church and encourage the progressive spirit in theology; and two of his pamphlets, "Plato, Philo, and Paul," and "The Mythos of the Ark," were published by Thomas Scott in his famous series. He was an earnest advocate of a comprehensive State Church, free from creeds and broad enough to include all sincere worshippers of the Father. Catholicity was his high ideal; it was typical of his disposition, and exemplified in the spirit of his ministry. His piety was simple and unaffected, springing from the natural trust of a loving disposition in the Author of our being, and a sincere confidence in the universal Fatherhood of God and His consequent care for the human race.

On his retirement from the ministry, through advancing years and growing infirmity, Mr. Lake removed to Margate. For years his powers, mental and physical, had been failing, but, fortunately, the gradual break-up of the system, though distressing to those who witnessed it, was unattended by pain to himself. The last change came quietly, and the long years of affectionate solicitude and watching for his welfare are for his widow now ended.

The funeral service was conducted on Wednesday last by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. of Bolton, and among the friends who followed the remains to their last resting-place in Margate Cemetery were Mr. Clarence Waterer, Mr. R. C. Bostock, and Captain Edward Marsh.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the "Imitatio Christi."

Unto many this seemeth a hard speech, "Deny thyself, take up thy cross, and follow Jesus."

He went before bearing his cross, and died for thee on the cross, that thou mayest also bear thy cross and desire to die on the cross with him.

Dispose and order all things according to thy will and judgment; yet thou shalt ever find, that of necessity thou must suffer somewhat either willingly or against thy will, and so thou shalt ever find the cross.

No man hath so cordial a feeling of the Passion of Christ, as he who hath suffered the like himself.

The cross therefore is always ready, and everywhere waits for thee. Thou canst not escape it, wheresoever thou runnest; for wheresoever thou goest, thou carriest thyself with thee, and shalt ever find thyself. Both above and below, without and within, which way soever thou dost turn thee, everywhere thou shalt find the cross; and everywhere of necessity thou must hold fast patience, if thou wilt have inward peace, and enjoy an everlasting crown.

If thou bear the cross cheerfully, it will bear thee, and lead thee to the desired end—namely, where there shall be an end of suffering, though here there shall not be. If thou bear it unwillingly, thou makest for thyself a new burden, and increasest thy load, and yet notwithstanding thou must bear it. If thou cast away one cross, without doubt thou shalt find another, and that perhaps a more heavy one.

Thinkest thou to escape that which no mortal man could ever avoid? Which of the saints in the world was without crosses and tribulation? "Christ must needs suffer, and rise again from the dead, and so enter into his glory." And how dost thou seek any other way than this royal way, which is the way of the holy cross?

From Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought."

Who will venture to say that the highest insight of the spirit is even half as constant as the highest action of the mind? Ask the saintliest men and women of this world whether their holy watch was continuous, and their faith and love as reliable as their thought; and they will tell you how long, even when they went up to be with the Saviour on the Mount, have been the slumbers of unconsciousness compared with the priceless instants when they were awake and beheld his glory. In every earnest life there are weary flats to tread, with the heavens out of sight—no sun, no moon—and not a tint of light upon the path below; when the only guidance is the faith of brighter hours, and the secret hand we are too numb and dark to feel. But to the meek and faithful it is not always so. Now and then something touches the dull dream of sense and custom, and the desolation vanishes away; the spirit leaves its witness with us; he divine realities come up from the past and straightway enter the present; the ear into which we poured our prayer is not deaf; the infinite eye to which we turned is not blind, but looks in with answering mercy on us. The mystery of life and the grievousness of death are gone; we know now the little from the great, the transient from the eternal; we can possess our souls in patience, and neither the waving palms and scattered flowers of triumph can elate us, nor the weight of any cross appear too hard to bear.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

NEXT Friday, which comes before Easter Sunday, is called Good Friday. It seems strange that such a name should have been given to it, when we remember that it is the day on which Jesus was put to a cruel death; but it is not because of what he suffered on the cross that we are glad, and feel that it is good to remember the day, it is because Jesus was "faithful unto death," because of the way in which he bore the cruelty of his enemies and the torture of his crucifixion. We thank God for what we learn from the death of Jesus, and for that trust which is stronger than all our fears, that death can only kill the body, and the faithful martyr rises out of the shadow of death into the glorious light of the heavenly life. Jesus has been called the "Chief of faithful souls," and that is how we should think of him on Good Friday. There are many other lessons to be learnt from his life and death, but none more important than this: that a true man will suffer torture and death itself rather than do wrong, or be false and a traitor to what he feels to be true and right.

It is sad to think that the happy days of the ministry of Jesus, when he gathered the children about him and taught the people to trust in goodness and in the heavenly Father's care, so soon came to an end; but it was another great gift that he left to us, when he showed men in his own life how to suffer patiently and bravely, and so also to do the Father's will.

Are not the people you admire most, and feel to be really the greatest, those who have not been afraid to suffer for the sake of others, or for some great cause? Perhaps you remember the old story of the Roman General Regulus, who had been made prisoner by the Carthaginians in a war with them. He was sent to Rome to persuade his countrymen to make peace with Carthage, but if he did not succeed, he promised to go back as a prisoner. The Roman people wanted to make peace for his sake, and when he would not let them, wanted to keep him safe from his enemies. But he was bound in honour, and would not break his promise; so he went back, and was put to a very cruel death. But we feel that he was a far braver and nobler man to be true in that way, and to keep his word. He thought it was best for Rome that peace should not be made, and sacrificed himself for his country and his friends.

Another old story is that of Arnold von Winkelried at the battle of Sempach, when he was fighting with his brave countrymen against the Austrian invaders for the freedom of Switzerland. They could not break the line of Austrian lances, and it seemed as if all must be lost, when Arnold rushed upon the lances, and gathering a great armful to himself, by his own death made a way for the others, so that the ranks of tyranny were broken, and his country was saved.

Those are stories of war, but there has been faithfulness unto death and self-sacrifice as noble in times of peace. Remember Father Damien, who in compassion for the loneliness and sufferings of the poor lepers, asked to be sent out to the leper colony of Molokai, and after living for years with those unhappy people, cheering and strengthening them, at last, as he had fully expected when he went, died of the same terrible disease. And you will remember many other cases of men who sacrificed their own life for others—the pilot who stood at the helm of the burning steamer, until he had steered it on to the shore, and only he perished in the flames; the engine-driver, who in a cloud of scalding steam stood to his engine until he had stopped the train, and so saved the lives of all the passengers, but himself died from the terrible injuries he received; and many another in storm and flood, in shipwreck and fire, who died helping others, or letting them be saved first, and so waiting quietly for death, because there was not time for all to be saved. And with these must be remembered all the martyrs who have died, bearing witness to truth and honour, refusing to save themselves by a lie.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." That is what we learn from the death of Jesus, and from many others whom we are thankful to remember with him, "the Chief of faithful souls."

It is the same lesson of unselfishness in great or in small things, in life or in death, that we all have to learn—unselfishness and faithfulness to what we know is right and true and good.

WE have received from the Ideal Publishing Union, 33, Paternoster-row, a parcel of books that will appeal specially to temperance advocates. The Case for Sunday Closing (1s.) is a useful book of reference for those who are interested in defending this movement. The Beverages we Drink, by W. N. Edwards (1s.), should be useful to those who wish to avoid unwholesome things. The Reminiscences of a Temperance Advocate, by Fred. Atkin (1s.), is very entertaining, and gives one an idea of the trials the early temperance reformers had to overcome. The United Temperance Gazette (annual volume, 2s.) contains a number of portraits of well-known advocates of this movement, and account of the doings of the various societies. The National Temperance Mirror (annual volume, 2s.) is compiled with a view to attracting the smaller members of the community to the temperance cause.

FREE CHURCH UNION.

THE meetings of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches in Liverpool last week seem to have been thoroughly successful, although a protest was uttered against the dangers of officialism, and Dr. GUINNESS ROGERS, who was unable to be present, has renewed in the Independent his plea that the national gathering ought to be regarded as a Congress, not as a representative Council. Dr. ROGERS is anxious that the Union should retain its free and elastic constitution, because in perfect freedom from denominational restraint is its strength and security. "All the important aims of the fellowship would be accomplished by a Congress formed very much after the model of the Church Congress, the success of which is largely due to the absence of any definite organisation."

The Council is to meet next year at Sheffield, and the next President, in succession to Dr. MACKENNAL, is to be a Wesleyan, the Rev. C. H. KELLY, of London.

We have been much interested in that passage of Dr. MACKENNAL's presidential address which dealt with the new Catechism. Dr. MACKENNAL evidently believes in it as an effective symbol of doctrine. "This Catechism," he said, "has not only demonstrated the unity of the Evangelical Free Churches, it has awakened a new hope of national religious peace in distinguished members of the Established Church. When the happy day, so rapidly approaching, of the liberation of religion from the patronage and control of the State has dawned, our Catechism may prove a banner around which new hosts of the Lord shall gather and go on gathering." But with this should be compared the opinion of Dr. MARSHALL RANGLES, quoted in another column.

In looking forward to the future development of the National Council, and of the local and district councils in which the practical religious work of the new Union is done, we should be sorry to think that there will be any further hardening of theological limits, or that this Catechism, as some of its sponsors evidently intend, should be used as an instrument for keeping out heresy. We must hope that the broader spirit of comprehension may prevail, on the lines so well expressed by the Christian World last week, and at present so fearlessly maintained by the Free Church Council of Burnley. Contact with a heretic, even in social work, seems to some of our orthodox brethren a dreadful thing; but if the attempt were made, even with the help of the new Catechism, mildest of instruments, to purge the National Council of heresy, what would be the result?

We dare still to hope that the time will come, and at no very distant date, when the councils engaged in united social and religious work throughout the country will freely welcome all willing helpers, and trust to the power of Christian truth and the spirit of earnest Christian fellowship, without question of heresy or orthodoxy, to maintain the soundness of the Union and the effectiveness of its work.

But if the councils still feel bound to maintain their united Evangelical missions, in which Unitarians could not be allowed, and would not desire to have any part, it is very much to be desired that the social work undertaken in the cause of temperance, purity, sanitation, education, should not be kept apart, but should be open to the earnest co-operation of all heretics, as in the days before the Council. The temperance platform has shown what can be done. The orthodox Evangelical has his own inward inspiration for such work, and the Unitarian has his, but they can and do work together for a common cause. It is not the least of the sins of orthodoxy that it should bring division and consequent weakness into work for the Kingdom of God, where the spirit of Christian brotherhood calls for unity and devoted co-operation.

THE IRISH UNIVERSITY QUESTION.

THE Irish University question can hardly be regarded at present as practical politics. The Duke of Devonshire declared the other day that Mr.

BALFOUR's suggestion of two new teaching Universities was met with opposition in the Government of which he is a member no less pronounced than his own conviction in its favour, and it did not seem likely that any Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, would be able to make such proposals as would really satisfy Roman Catholic opinion.

At the same time Mr. BALFOUR's proposal has led to a very vigorous discussion. Our readers will remember the three letters which we received from the Rev. C. J. STREET, giving an interesting account of the past history of University education in Ireland, and very ably stating the Nonconformist position of non possumus in this matter. The Nonconformist Political Council have taken the same view in a statement issued by the Executive Committee, which includes, among many prominent ministers and laymen, the Revs. Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, Dr. CLIFFORD, J. BERNARD SNELL, and W. COPELAND BOWIE, Messrs. P. W. CLAYDEN, H. BROADHURST, G. H. KENRICK, J. COMPTON RICKETT, and SAMUEL SMITH, with the president, Mr. R. W. PERKS, the vice-president, Mr. D. LLOYD GEORGE, and Mr. J. HIRST HOLLOWELL, the secretary. The statement concludes as follows:—

The Nonconformist Political Council is prepared to admit that changes are required in order to bring Trinity College and Dublin University into stricter harmony with the principles of religious equality, and is prepared to use its influence towards that end. What is wanted is a National Teaching University, and in such an institution Roman Catholics should unquestionably have their due place. But the only principle on which a University, acceptable to all classes, and entitled to be called national, can be created, is that those subjects on which Churches are so deeply divided, and which they legitimately regard as of great importance, should be taken out of the official programme of studies, and left to the care and exposition of Church colleges, independent of the University, as the University would be independent of them.

But the trouble in Ireland seems to be, that a large proportion of the people, who are Roman Catholics, would not find such a University acceptable, and therefore must remain unsatisfied, unless some other method can be devised.

Perhaps the most effective criticism to which Mr. BALFOUR's proposal has been subjected is to be found in a pamphlet by Mr. JOHN MASSIE, of Mansfield College, Oxford, "The Proposed University for Roman Catholics in Ireland," published by the Liberation Society. The reason which weighs most strongly with us—at least for a suspense of judgment in this matter—is in what Mr. MASSIE says of the division of opinion in the Irish Roman Catholic Episcopate on this question in past years, and the suggestion that, but for Episcopal pressure, the majority of Roman Catholic laymen would prefer that their sons should not be educated in a separate University, but should be sent to Trinity College or elsewhere, as Nonconformists are now sent to Oxford and Cambridge in this country.

On the whole question we confess that our feeling remains unaltered, that the most generous treatment possible is due from this country to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, not as special favour, but as "a measure of justice," and if Mr. BALFOUR's proposal is proved to be impracticable, then some other method of really satisfying the demand for higher education ought to be found.

If nothing else will avail, we should not shrink even from a course that would involve what is termed "the discredited principle" of concurrent endowment. The wrongs of the Roman Catholics of Ireland at the hands of a dominant Protestantism in the past have been so great, that their case seems to us to stand quite alone and to demand separate consideration on its own merits without attempting too close a parallel between their position and that of Protestant Nonconformists. But it is essential that as far as possible the mind of the educated laity, as distinguished from the hierarchy, should be known, and that their needs and aspirations in the matter of University education should be met.

IN HIS STEPS.

"WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?"

"SIR, I bought this for you," said one of our choir boys, as he handed me a penny edition of the above-named book. He instantly added, half apologetically, "It is not a secular book; so I thought it might suit and please you." It has suited and pleased me more deeply than any book I have read for many a day. But in one respect my little friend was quite off the track. Though reference to Jesus is constant on its every page, and though it is the most powerful of sermons, it is yet a secular book, and the right kind of a secular book. Its secularism is the secularism that ought to be; not that "which now is, for this is in bondage with her children."

The book is a sermon story. Too long for delivery at any one hour, it was told a chapter at a time by the writer to his evening congregation. There are twelve chapters. A sermon on an entirely novel plan, for twelve Sunday evenings!

The scene opens in a thriving city of one of the Western States of the American Republic—a city where the churches are thriving no less than business. The young and engaging minister of the First Church has been preaching one of his best sermons on following Christ. The soprano solo has sung in her delightful way a hymn about following him. The congregation are in a fine glow of satisfaction over their minister and over their music—when a voice comes from the rear of the church asking to speak; and a poor fellow, whom the minister recognises as having asked for a job at his door only the day before, comes to the front to ask, not reprovingly nor reproachfully, but simply as if he were puzzled by it—"What is it they mean by following Jesus?" He tells his story, pitiful enough, how a new machine has thrown him and a lot of others out of work; how he has been looking for work for months, how his wife has died meantime from anxiety and starvation, how he has been a week in this very city without the least interest being taken in his story, with not a hand lifted to help him, with no one to speak a sympathetic word to him "except your minister here who said he was very sorry for me, and hoped I would find a job somewhere." While speaking he falls fainting. "Some heart trouble," the doctor said. He is carried to the minister's house, cared for there for a week, and at four the next Sunday morning he dies—after saying to the minister, who has scarcely left him day or night, "You have been good to me; somehow I feel as if it was what Jesus would do."

This tragic occurrence makes a deep impression; especially does the minister take it to heart, and the congregation are almost equally agitated by what has happened. In the preacher's mind the question what it is to follow Jesus has become terribly distinct, and demands a very different answer from anything he has ever given it. It does not now seem enough that he should try to write a sermon his people will admire. It does not now seem enough that he should live on friendly terms with a large congregation of respectable and prosperous people. The next Sunday he speaks out of this heightened, deepened, strangely new experience. He tells his hearers how the thought of the reality of following Jesus has grown upon him, and asks those who feel as he does to join with him in a pledge for one year to live their whole lives as they believe that Jesus would do were he in their place. Some fifty join him. Each is to judge for himself by his own conscience, but always taking Jesus for his standard; always asking, in reference to this or that course of action, "What would Jesus do, in just this my situation?" and then act accordingly.

The interest of the story now turns upon the results that follow in the life and conduct of those who take this pledge. The minister sees clearly what he believes Jesus would do were he the minister of this First Church, and for his own guidance jots down:—

Live in a simple, plain manner, without needless luxury or undue asceticism.

Preach fearlessly to the hypocrites in the church, no matter what their social importance or wealth.

Show in some practical form sympathy and love for the common people, as well as for the well-to-do, educated, and refined people.

Identify himself with the great causes of humanity in some personal way that would call for self-denial and suffering.

Preach against the drinking den.

Become known as a friend and companion of the sinful people.

Give up the summer trip to Europe, using the money for someone who needs a vacation more than I do.

This seemed to him hasty, incomplete, though at every point it meant for him the overturning of his habits hitherto in the ministry. To walk "in his steps" meant, in Whittier's phrase, "out of self to love be led."

The editor of the leading paper of the city takes the pledge. His first test comes when his manager brings him the report of a prize-fight three and a-half columns long. Would Jesus put that in were he editor? Yet it is the thing that will sell the paper—the thing the public expects. No matter; he meant to keep his word. So against the remonstrances of the manager—and the amazement of the reporters—and the dismay of the newsboys—he rules it out; with, of course, the result of the return of half the edition to the office. Then comes the question of certain advertisements. Would Jesus, knowing their character as I do, put them in? There is but one answer; and he gives notice that they will be discontinued. Then comes the question of the Sunday edition. This "paid." There was a column or two of literary and religious items; but thirty or forty of sport, gossip, scandal, horrors, fashion, society, party politics. If Jesus were editor, would he plan to put in the homes of all the city such a collection of reading matter on the one day of the week which should be given to something higher and better? He could not think so—and there was but one course to take. So against opposition and financial loss the endeavour to walk "in his steps" went on. One sees how different is the real from the make-believe following of Jesus—and as well, how much more manly, effectual, satisfying, and blessed.

A large shopkeeper with half-a-dozen establishments has joined in this endeavour to do as Jesus would do in his place. We follow him through change after change in his personal relation to clerks, book-keepers, office-boys, and draymen, until his whole business method is reconstructed, humanised.

The superintendent of the railway shops keeps to his pledge—and after making these shops quite another place to the men who are employed in them, discovers by accident that his company is actually defrauding the Government on a large scale, and that this has been going on for a long time. Shall he shut his eyes, keep quiet about it? If not, he must lose his place—deprive his family of many a comfort. But he knows what Jesus would do—gives up his place, and goes back to work as a telegraph operator. He saves his soul; chooses to be a man; lives a true, not a sham, follower of Jesus.

After one has read a book like this, and felt it, one goes on to think about it. Fifteen or sixteen years ago another religious novel was published, which also had an immense popularity—"Robert Elsmere." The point of interest in that was the breakdown of a man's belief in supernatural Christianity, and the readjustment of his belief to a natural Christianity—a natural Jesus. But the point of interest here is quite different. Such questions as took hold of Elsmere have no existence for anyone in this book. The centre of interest is shifted to purely practical questions. True, Elsmere turns to practical social efforts as the work of his life, but he has a long time of intellectual struggle and pain and abandonment of things precious before settling there. But no one in this book seems to have any idea that speculative problems exist. They all consider themselves orthodox believers, sing very evangelical hymns; and yet there is scarcely such a thing as doctrine in the book. Everything is merged—as Jesus merged everything—in questions of life. Jesus dominates the book; but Jesus, our brother—a real man, not a make-believe; an actual leader in virtue of his humanity—a true example whom we may follow.

Is this, then, the direction in which Christian thought is moving? Is it concentrating itself on applying its ideal to present life? Is it on this side that its present interest is found? We might not think so if we read only our English newspapers, full of ecclesiastical contentions and strife. But see what a response a book, which drops all but this side, instantly meets! We may venture to believe, despite the English Church Union, that the true point of interest for Christianity at this moment in the public mind is not in sacramental or sacerdotal, or (this is to ourselves) even in critical or doctrinal questions, but in practical ones. What can you do through your religion for the common life? How does it influence your own life?

One is also struck by this:—That the centre of interest is found not only in practical, but in personal effort. We have heard a great deal about an improved social life. The novel has been freely used to set forth the need of a new social system; the absolute necessity for such a system. The schemes have been many, but all have had one disadvantage. Before they can be realised, something must take place which doesn't take place. There is a gap between us and the new time which we can't fill up. But here the direct appeal is to each man or woman just where he is, in the calling wherein he is called, to begin immediately; just there to see what Jesus would do in his place, and to do it. This seems healthy, consistent, rational—a good direction for popular religious and secular thought to take;—for our own thought to take. Here is the good news of a kingdom of heaven already with us—not coming by-and-by.

Of course this book will raise the question in many minds: "Since the appeal, after all, in the last resort, is to a man's own conscience, why bring in Jesus? Why not bid each man follow his own moral ideal?"

To this it may be said: there is here and there a person who would respond to the call to follow his own best ideal even more willingly than to the call to follow Jesus. One cannot say that his ideal is necessarily any higher or purer for this. But we may be sure that for the immense majority of us the ideal associated with Jesus is more affecting, more powerful, than anyone can call up without him. If anyone thinks it ought not to be so, he has but to look around him to see that it is so; that the ideal starting from a real person—a historical experience—has an actuality and substance which a novel and imaginary type lacks. To the Jesus of the gospels we have added Jesus invested with the pre-eminence assigned him by consenting ages—a person, certainly, but also the common symbol of the highest ideals of man. He rectifies, heightens, steadies our feeble, or crude, or variable and partial ideals. Most of us do not resent this as bondage, but accept and gratefully use it as our inherited standard for measuring manliness—our own and the general humanity of men.

Finally, this little book—which one would that all should read—makes us aware that we have appreciated the passive virtues of Jesus rather than the active. We haven't thought often enough of Jesus the brave and outspoken prophet, as the perfectly sincere one who dared to be true to the insight of his conscience against the religious world no less than the worldly world, who dealt with things and not with formulas, who looked and lived for a kingdom of God on earth, who was unwearied in his teaching of social duty, whose aim was to save the world. In these pages you have not Jesus the sufferer, but the doer; not the passive Jesus, but the active. And no one can read it without feeling the rebuke that is written: "Why call ye me Lord, Lord—and do not the things that I say?"

Our Friend, our Brother and our Guide
What may thy service be?
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual pride,
But simply following thee.

THE CHURCH'S FUNCTIONS.

SIR,—Your issue of the 18th inst. has a peculiar interest, in that we find therein, lying side by side, three distinct conceptions of the functions of a Christian Church.

The basis of your article is the twice-repeated statement that "the church is for worship." The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards says, in his Provincial Letter, that the "chief function of the Church is to build up the spiritual life of its members;" and, finally, we gather from the noble words of the Rev. Wilfred Harris, that the Church's duty is to "call sinners."

It is quite possible, and we may hope it is often the case, that a church may serve all three ends. A given church will consist of true worshippers, gathering together week by week in a spirit of reverent devotion; the services will tend to kindle the devotion and raise the spiritual life and enthusiasm of the worshippers; and occasionally a helpful call will be sounded to reach the ears of those who are not true worshippers, who hardly recognise what a spiritual life means, who struggle on day by day, fighting a very unequal battle with the pain and misery and sorrow which surrounds them.

But put yourself in my place. I am treasurer of a society which exists for missionary purposes, and it is, therefore, part of my duty to entreat for funds to maintain and carry forward such purposes. For which form of Church life am I to plead? Am I to ask for money to keep on foot congregations of faithful worshippers upon whom seems to have fallen so large a share of the content of righteousness, and where so poor a recognition is given to those astray or outside the fold? Such an appeal can hardly be expected to touch many hearts, or open wide many purses. Nay, I have been told, if these congregations want a minister and a chapel, let them pay for them themselves. But if I may say: There are sparsely dotted about this fair Cheshire county of ours small assemblages of Christian folk, seeking under their pastor's leadership, to become true, faithful worshippers of all that is good, all that makes for righteousness—congregations who, through pulpit exhortations, are left aware of their shortcomings, urged to press on towards a nobler life and taught a forward road, where the tone of the service is reverent and sincere alike in hymn, reading and prayer, where, in fine, the main object is to "call sinners," to win souls—I should expect to hear, if such congregations need help, it is our duty to aid them in their scattered efforts to make their lives and the lives of those around them purer, nobler, more Christ-like.

I quite admit the weight of responsibility which falls upon the congregations: they check to a too great extent the aspirations of the minister, but I am doubtful whether the ideal congregation, foreshadowed in your article, would be helpful for missionary purposes.

But, perhaps, after all, there is another and a graver hindrance to the god-speed of the Christian message—a hindrance which such a book as "In His Steps" brings to mind.

THOS. H. GORDON.

Thorncliffe, Dukinfield, March 21.

[In what we wrote last week of "Churches that Minister," we urged distinctly that religion has to do with the real things of life. No true spiritual worship can leave a congregation at rest in the "content of righteousness," but must be a constant call to greater faithfulness of life, in personal consecration, and in ministering to the needs of the world. In our ideal of the Church's functions, there can be no separation of the three conceptions which Mr. Gordon has enumerated. Certainly the first is very imperfectly realised, if it does not include the other two.—ED. INQ.]

A BEAUTIFUL SERVICE.

SIR,—It was with a sense of great disappointment that I finished reading your Leading Article in last week's issue on "Churches that Minister." That the church is for worship, and that religion has to do with the real things of life, no one will deny. But I venture to say that the effect of the article as a whole was as a gentle shower of cold water upon those of us who would like to see our churches boldly seizing the opportunity, which their liberty gives them, of deliberately making a large provision in their worship for the ministry of beauty. The church is for worship; yes, but what is worship? Is it not at least a certain attitude of mind toward the true, the good, and the beautiful which are one in God? If so, has beauty of sound, colour, and form no place in it? Is there not holiness in beauty as well as beauty in holiness? Can there be a full adequate common prayer and common worship without the very things which your article tends to belittle? The Puritan Meeting House and the silent meeting of Friends may suit certain choice exquisites of the spiritual world. Indeed, I give place to no one in my admiration for the Society of Friends. But most of us are all too human and earthy, and require stimulating in heavenly things—we need the preliminary tempering and toning which noble architecture, moving music, dignified liturgy, beautiful pictorial and plastic art, and, generally, a "high" service can give.

You do well to emphasise the prior need of reverence, but surely it is well also to emphasise the need of something visible and audible that can compel reverence? We cannot ignore universal human experience with regard to the power of association, and the "psychological climate" of a place of worship, and the actual service. It is not by abstaining from looking on the visible that we are to learn to see the invisible. It is not by keeping out of the art gallery, and the concert, and looking up our favourite poets and writers, that we train ourselves to appreciate the beautiful, the good, and the true. Nor should it be forgotten that we go to church not only to worship, but to learn to worship—to be put in an attitude of soul that makes worship natural as breathing.

Your position seems to be this: "Every place, and every time, is holy—to the saint; therefore, let us all be saints." This is as magnificent in ideal as it is true in fact. But does not the present condition of our church life warrant the insistence on a truth much more neglected in theory, and much more applicable in practice? May I, therefore, invert the argument thus—"We are not all saints: a beautiful service makes us aspire to be saints: aspiration sometimes leads to attainment: therefore, let us have a beautiful service."

You may dispute the statement that a beautiful service has this effect. If you do, I can only appeal ad populum, and wait the result with confidence. In any case you will admit that such a service "draws a crowd"—and that by means in themselves legitimate and seemly. Now from a preacher's point of view, this means a good deal; for that crowd is to be influenced before it goes away. May I point out in conclusion that while it is true that a crowded attractive service may have no true religion in it, the Puritan meeting, and the silent meeting of Friends, may be equally wanting in the religious spirit? [We are very glad to have Mr. Thomas's letter, although there was no intention of cold water in the article to which he refers, and certainly no wish to discourage the use of beauty in the forms of our service, if only in the beauty and the ritual God is not forgotten, and the fundamental purpose of spiritual worship. —ED. MANCHESTER DISTRICT: A CORRECTION.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to an inaccuracy in my last Provincial Letter. In speaking of the new school building at Gorton, I said it was to cost about £5,000, and that the whole amount was in hand. I am, however, officially informed that the school is to cost £6,500, towards which there is already in hand and promised £5,500; so that another £1,000 has to be raised. I, therefore, hasten to make this correction.

CHARLES ROPER.

THE MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION: A CORRECTION.

SIR,—Allow me to correct a somewhat important error in the report of the annual meeting of the above Association appearing in last week's INQUIRER. The suggestion which I made was not that the word "Christian" should be omitted from the title of the Association, but that the word "Unitarian" should be inserted in such title, either with or without further names. Your report would lead a reader to suppose that I had some serious objection to the word "Christian." My only objection is that the word, standing alone, is not sufficiently descriptive of the religious opinions held by the congregations which form the Union.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.

THE annual meeting of this Mission was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Tuesday evening, March 12. A pleasant hour was spent in social intercourse, tea being served in the upper room, and at eight o'clock the chair was taken by Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C. There were present also the Revs. Frederic Allen (minister of the chapel), W. Copeland Bowie, T. E. M. Edwards, W. C. Pope, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. S. S. Tayler, C. F. Pearson, I. S. Lister, E. S. G. Warren, Percy Preston, A. A. Tayler, A. H. Biggs, J. Welch, J. R. Gregg, J. C. Ballantyne, J. Tayler, W. S. Tayler, A. S. Tayler, Mrs. David Martineau, Miss Preston, Mrs. H. Rutt, Miss Tayler, Miss C. Brooker, and many others.

After the singing of an opening hymn, Mr. ATHELSTAN TAYLER read the minutes of the last annual meeting on April 21, when the chapel was re-opened after renovation and the amalgamation with the Blackfriars Mission, the preacher at the opening service being the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke.

The Rev. F. ALLEN then read passages from his report:—

The report spoke of the difficulties under which the work had been carried on during the first quarter of the year, while the removal from the Mission in the New-cut was being effected; the chapel was still in the hands of workmen, and Mr. Allen had not yet removed from Chatham. But those difficulties were surmounted, and though the Sunday school suffered a little through the removal, it was again gaining ground, and all the institutions were in thorough working order. The visitors of the Provident Bank had collected £674 8s. 3d., the largest amount since its establishment in 1886, the depositors numbering 1,077, an increase of 146 on the previous year. This was felt to be some of the most valuable work of the Mission, and more help was needed. The Mothers' Meeting, the Young Women's Club, the Band of Hope were all actively at work. In connection with the Boys' Brigade an Ambulance Class had been recently started by Mr. John Tayler. During the summer forty-nine families had been sent for a week or a fortnight to the country cottage at Raynes Park. A summer holiday in country homes had also been provided for thirty-two children. A Social and Literary Union, a Unity Temperance Society, Children's Happy Evenings, and Saturday Evening Concerts, which had been greatly appreciated in the neighbourhood, were among the other activities of the Mission.

The Committee, embodying Mr. Allen's and other reports with their own, spoke with satisfaction of the result of the amalgamation as shown in the first year's work. The building and furnishing fund was balanced by selling out £268 6s. of London and North Western Railway stock.

Mr. C. F. PEARSON, as Treasurer, presented the statement of accounts. The building fund showed an expenditure of £1,572 7s. 4d., raised chiefly by donations. The general account showed an expenditure of £462 2s. 6½d., leaving a balance of £16 3s. 10d. due to the treasurer.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports and the accounts, said that as he was coming to the meeting he had received from the cabman who drove him over Blackfriars-bridge a certificate of the excellence of the Saturday evening concerts given in the chapel. It was a pleasure to him to be there that night, and to see his old friend Mr. Allen thoroughly established and doing such admirable work. He laid stress on the value of the Provident Society, not only on account of the good done by the collecting of money and encouraging habits of thrift, but even more because of the friendships it led to, bringing the helpers and the people of the district regularly together in relations of unaffected sympathy. Having referred to other branches of the work, as detailed in the report, he said that it was always a great grief to him to see the extremes of wealth and poverty side by side in that city—the luxury that hardened and the poverty that seemed to degrade. He supposed that there would always be such contrasts, and yet he could not help thinking that a great deal of the extreme poverty was due to somebody's neglect, and that if the wilful and the ignorant had been trained, if those who were out of work had been fitted for some useful occupation, if the children had been taken in hand when young, and if there had been fewer drink-shops up and down the neighbourhood, fewer temptations to wrong, there would have been far less poverty and less sin than there was. He had been present that day in Westminster Abbey at the funeral service of Lord Herschell, a great judge and a great man, who died abroad, honoured by Americans and Englishmen alike. It was a most impressive service, and amid the solemn music, the cymbals and the drums and the great organ, there had rung out one clear boy's voice, singing "God shall wipe away all tears." That had made a great impression. To wipe away the tears from all faces was God's work, and yet each one in his own place could do something to lessen the sadness and misery of the world, and wipe away the tears from a few faces. They could each do something to make the world a little happier and better because they had lived in it.

The Rev. W. C. POPE, seconding, said that while they were all dreamers of dreams, or ought to be, and had ideals which were never fulfilled, they must not on that account consider their work a failure. They could not think that the work done in that congregation by Mr. Spears, and by Mr. Bowie and other ministers, and by faithful members through many years, because it had failed to realise the ideals they had set before them, had been a failure, and had not been fruitful of much good.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the motion, said that he had noticed in the reports how the same names occurred over and over again, and a great burden of work seemed to be laid on a few willing helpers. They must not work their friends too hard, but must appeal for others to share in their labours. The need was of "more labourers for white harvest fields," for good, honest, God-fearing work. The motion was then unanimously passed.

Mr. E. S. G. WARREN moved, and Mr. GREGG seconded, the appointment of the committee and officers, the hon. treasurers being Messrs. C. F. Pearson and W. S. Tayler; the hon. secretaries, Messrs. A. H. Biggs and A. A. Tayler.

Mr. A. H. Biggs moved a resolution of congratulation to Mr. Allen, and of thanks to him for his unremitting labours. At the beginning of last year the chapel had been like the inside of the Pavonia as she came across the Atlantic in the recent gale, with the machinery all adrift and the boilers rolling about. Their work had been in confusion; but then Mr. Allen had come and taken command of the ship, and with a fine head to guide, and a fine heart to sympathise, had set their machinery all in order. It was not only that the chapel had been newly painted and made to look very attractive, it had been made through Mr. Allen's wise oversight very attractive to work in. To him the most cordial thanks were due.

Mr. PERCY PRESTON seconded the motion, referring to the very laborious work involved, not only to the ladies, but to Mr. Allen and to Mr. Midlane in the management of the Provident Bank.

Mr. S. S. TAYLER moved a resolution for the appointment of the Rev. F. Allen as a member of the Presbyterian Board, in succession to the late Rev. R. Spears, Stamford-street being one of the old congregations having the privilege of so appointing their minister. In doing so Mr. Tayler gave an interesting account of the history and purpose of the Board.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. I. S. LISTER, and passed.

The Rev. W. C. BOWIE then moved, and the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS seconded, a resolution of thanks to the workers of the Mission. Mr. Bowie pointed out that there were not, after all, so few workers there. He had counted forty, and perhaps there were more. Some of those who had helped to start the Provident Bank in 1886 were still engaged in that work, and it was of the greatest value. It was not only friends who came from a distance, but there were others living in the immediate neighbourhood who were among the most faithful workers, and he hoped their number would continually increase.

Mr. C. F. PEARSON said that while there was only £16 owing on their general account, they did not yet know what the requirements of the new work would be. He desired to thank the donors to the Building Fund and the subscribers to the Mission, and to make an appeal for an extended interest in their work. There was room for more work and more workers. Especially for the Provident work, which was a great pioneer for the Mission in that district, they ought to have more helpers.

The Rev. FREDERIC ALLEN emphasised Mr. Pearson's appeal for more helpers in the Provident work. Two of their ladies visited 200 families every week, and others had nearly as many to visit. If they did not secure more help, the work would have to be curtailed. He gratefully acknowledged the kind things that had been said of him and Mrs. Allen, and of their work. He had not yet realised his ideals; there was still much to be done not only in social and material, but in spiritual work! He pleaded that the Sunday services should be attended as frequently and regularly as possible. Their chapel was for the worship of God, and the service of man; the worship helped their daily life and work.

A resolution of thanks to the Chairman having been passed, on the motion of Mr. J. WELCH, seconded by Mr. C. F. PEARSON, Dr. Odgers put in a word for next year's bazaar, and a concluding hymn and benediction brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE MIDLANDS.

WHEN I undertook to write a letter at this time I had in mind the annual meetings of the Midland Christian Union as its subject matter.

In the report, which you published last week, the names following the words, "there were also present," suggest a meagre attendance. That was not true in fact. In point of numbers the meetings were very good. In the morning there were about a hundred persons in the church; in the afternoon twice as many. And as we passed through the stages of business and controversy; of discussion initiated by the Rev. James C. Street, in his spirit of inexhaustible buoyancy and hope; and of worship, in which the sermon preached by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, M.A., carried us into that ampler ether and diviner air where every breath of controversy was hushed in the thought and presence of the Father in whom we are all one, we felt that it was good for us to have come together, to have faced our problems, and renewed our vows.

It is difficult to characterise the report of the Committee. It told of work which has been done, over which we fittingly rejoice. It spoke of fields ripe unto harvest into which we cannot send the labourers to reap. That, a passage ran, "will be an evil hour not only for the Union but for our cause in the Midlands, when our supporters reach the conclusion that any extension of activities is undesirable. For the decay of the missionary spirit is always a sign that a faith has lost its vital relation to life. To your Committee it is inconceivable that the churches should permit great opportunities to pass by unseized, especially when religious developments in the country are opening a surer way for the progress of a reasonable faith, and bringing to the Free Churches such chances of expansion and wide usefulness as perhaps they have never had." Why this note of question as to the future? First, because by the death of Mr. Charles Cochrane it has suffered a severe loss. "It has never had a friend more loyal, nor a supporter so generous." Unless there be found new and liberal subscribers to take his place, there will be a serious permanent diminution of income. That would be nothing short of a disaster. Second, because there does seem to be something in the nature of a general indifference to missionary enterprise of any kind. The inability to move in new directions has been felt acutely because the Union has been invited to assist in giving ministers to two churches in the Potteries. There is little doubt that, under the guidance of capable and earnest men, both would become a real power. And for the present, at least, no help can be given. Beyond this there are many opportunities for the most valuable service. To mention one scheme which has been discussed and approved, the lay preachers are ready to go to some place undetermined and conduct Sunday services regularly. A lay preachers' church has features of its own and is well worth trying; but, again, the want of funds to enable the Union to back up the movement renders it immediately impossible. For my own part I have often dreamed another dream. It is that some of us, or a missionary appointed for the purpose, should go to the various towns and villages in our area and there deliver courses of sermons or lectures, without any idea or design of founding a church. It should be simply taking throughout the Midlands the message we have to deliver. How many would hear it gladly! What quickening of thought, and even of spiritual life might there not follow! Here and there perhaps people would be desirous of organising themselves into a church. But that would be the exceptional result, which, indeed, while we in no way sought it, would rejoice our hearts. My idea is to go, sow the good seed and leave it. I would not take the drawn sword and the fiery cross. Far from it. The message should be one of peace and good will. Surely we have something positive to speak to the mind and heart of this age. But supposing there should ever arise any disposition to take up the idea, there would be necessary for carrying it out a considerable annual expenditure. And whence could we hope the income?

But I have wandered into by-paths. Of Small Heath your report spoke. Stratford-on-Avon is pressing eagerly forward. The congregation possesses its iron room, and is repaying the loan, by the aid of which it was purchased, to the Union. This week at the School Board election Mr. F. L. Talbot, who has rendered the movement such invaluable service, has been triumphantly returned. He is, I believe, the first Unitarian who has occupied a seat on the Board. His is sure to prove a powerful influence for educational efficiency, and against any denominational narrowness. Most heartily are he and Stratford to be congratulated. An experiment is being tried at Alcester. Mr. A. Z. Dade, a lay-preacher, has been appointed a lay-worker there for one year. He is one of those fortunate individuals who have private means, and so can be content with the very small income which the endowment brings in. Up to the present, all the news we get is most encouraging, and there is every hope that he will succeed in a difficult undertaking. Although nothing was specifically said of them, all the aided churches are doing good work, and it is a satisfaction to the Committee to be able to assist them. At Lye a bazaar has recently been held to raise funds for cleaning and redecorating the church and manse, which realised £98; and at West Bromwich a sale of work is on the point of being held with a similar object.

I almost hesitate to refer to Wolverhampton again for fear of writing something which will not please. But I must record the fact that the congregation have sold the whole property for £1,000; have purchased a new site in a very favourable quarter of the town for £600; and are about to remove their iron schoolroom thither. They themselves are full of hope, and everyone will be more than delighted if the new venture succeeds. Certainly they will have the good wishes of all who are interested in the cause of Liberal Christianity, and no doubt if they show cause will receive help more substantial than sympathy. For my own part, I candidly confess to having lost faith in the congregation. But one of their number has assured me that it is without sufficient reason. That I am more than ready to believe. Nothing will delight me more than to assist in pillorying the pessimist.

I pass to a significant incident which followed the moving of the reports. The calm atmosphere of the proceedings was disturbed by the blowing of a keen wind from an unusual quarter. As I write, winter has returned to blot out the audacious spring. So was there flung upon us then the snow of denominationalism. We are not used to it. But Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee loves his theological Spitzbergen. To him it is a bracing climate, full of health. And he cannot enter our temperate zone without banging a glacier into it. He will probably find our sun a little too strong. But in the meantime the storm continues, and the glacier is unmelted. In other words, he wants the Union to label itself Unitarian, and carried a resolution asking the committee to consider the question and report to a specially-summoned meeting. In one particular THE INQUIRER, following the Daily Post, does Mr. Lee an injustice. He did not suggest that "the word Christian should be omitted from the title and description of the Union." He would be the first to repudiate any such proposal. What he does desire is that the word Unitarian shall be added; until and unless it be he has not the slightest sympathy with the Union, and will not raise a little finger to help it. One cannot help a certain admiration for the pertinacity with which Mr. Lee presses his conviction of the needs for definiteness, but it is passing strange for some of us who have come from the orthodox denominations to find the spirit of dogmatism eager to stamp the Free Churches. Why, it was their breadth, their universality, which so attracted us. "Here," we said to ourselves, "is a body of persons among whom freedom of thought is not only allowed, but desiderated; who are concerned for intellectual honesty and the religious life. They are not even committed to Unitarianism. Truth to them is dearer and greater than the maintaining of any dogma." It seemed that we could breathe the atmosphere of that supreme saying—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; and thy neighbour as thyself"; that we had found the true Holy Catholic Church. Nor have we been wholly disappointed.

The more difficult is it for us to understand the temper which will throw away this magnificent ideal for a merely provincial and sectarian position in the religious world. Mr. Lee really believes that because it is not labelled definitely Unitarian, the Union fails of support. It will be seen whether he has many sympathisers. If he should carry his point quite sure I am that it would be at the sacrifice of some who are now deeply interested in its work. No, I will not believe that, although there is apparently interminable winter in London, and in other parts of the country which he indicated with satisfaction, the Midlands will ever be persuaded that it affords the most favourable conditions for the growth of the fair flowers of religious truth and love universal.

ADDISON A. CHARLESWORTH.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birmingham Postal Mission.—The sixth annual meeting was held on Tuesday last, March 21. The Lady Mayoress (Mrs. Beale) presided. There was a fair attendance. The hon. secretary, Mrs. Herbert New, read the report of the year's work, which showed a quiet steady increase in numbers, and satisfactory work accomplished; 646 letters had been received, of which 230 were new applications, and 956 letters written by the Committee. Several correspondents have joined churches this year, and others have shown their appreciation and gratitude for help given, by sending donations to the funds. The treasurer, Miss Beale, presented the accounts for the year, which showed a small adverse balance. The reports were adopted, and the officers and Committee elected.

Bolton Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting of this Union was held at Horwich on Saturday week. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. R. C. Moore, president, who was supported by the Revs. J. J. Wright, and A. H. Dolphin, and Mr. H. Diggle, one of the secretaries. A paper was read by Mr. Dolphin on the proposed summer session for Sunday-school teachers at Oxford, and Revs. J. J. Wright and N. Anderton, and Messrs. T. Harwood, Whalley and Platt took part in the discussion. The scheme was generally approved, and a resolution was passed urging the Committee of the Union to consider the matter with a view to helping towards a successful meeting this year.

Carlisle.—Mr. B. C. Pal (Manchester College) paid a second visit to Carlisle last Sunday, and preached to two large congregations on "The Love of God," and "The Message of India to England." The following (Monday) evening he lectured for the Carlisle Women's Liberal Association on "The Women of India," and received a very hearty welcome from a good company.

Derby.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last. The Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., preaching in the morning from Proverbs xxii. 1, and in the evening from Matthew xix. 14. In the afternoon the children's service was conducted by Councillor W. G. Wilkins. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. S. Neville Cox, organist, and gave additional attraction to very interesting services.

Great Yarmouth.—The annual congregational tea of the Old Meeting congregation, was held in the schoolroom on Thursday, 16th inst. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. Rodger Smyth, who reported that, since September, weekly meetings had been held of the Boys' Club, the Young People's Social Circle, and the Literary Society; also monthly meetings and lantern entertainments of the Band of Hope, and that other meetings were contemplated. Sunday evening lectures and people's services had also been held, with slightly improved attendance. The Rev. W. Jellie, and Mr. R. H. Fuller, of Braintree, addressed the meeting, and spoke words of hope and encouragement to the congregation and the minister.

Hull.—The last meeting of the Literary and Social Union for this season was held on Wednesday, March 15, and took the form of a dramatic entertainment, which was thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed by the audience. Old Cronies proved as amusing as ever. A second sketch had as its novel subject, The Lady Interviewer, and the third, a charming and most playable piece, entitled His Sister, had the good fortune to count among its accomplished caste the author, Mr. H. A. Spurr.

London: Plumstead.—A sale of work and social were held in connection with the above place of worship on the 16th and 17th insts. The hall was beautifully decorated for the occasion. On Thursday afternoon there were present Mrs. Nettlefold, Miss Nettlefold, Mrs. A. Lawrence, Miss E. M. Lawrence, Mr. David Martineau, the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, H. Woods Perrie, L. Jenkins Jones, and a good number of friends and sympathisers. After a few remarks explanatory of the purpose of the sale of work by the minister, Mrs. Nettlefold, in a very gracious speech, declared it opened, expressing her desire that all would do something. The Friday evening was happily spent in a social gathering. The sale of work realised about £80.

London: Stepney Green.—On Sunday evening, March 19, the Rev. Principal Gordon conducted a service in College Chapel, in memory of the late Rev. Robert Spears. The chapel was full of sympathetic friends, who were associated with Mr.

Spears in his East-end work, and who appreciated the earnest and eloquent tribute paid to his memory by the preacher.

London: Welsh Unitarians.—The service in the Council-room, Essex Hall, last Sunday, was well attended, when the Rev. C. E. Jenkins, Capelygroes, officiated, and preached a sermon based on Matt. xiii. 3-8, full of encouragement.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Saturday, March 18, a joint party of the Cricket and Football clubs and the Social Union was held in the Temperance Hall, Grey Mare-lane. A good number of members and friends sat down to tea. The after meeting was presided over by the minister, Rev. W. E. Atack, who takes a deep and active interest in providing healthy and instructive recreation for the younger members of the church and school. The Rev. C. Roper spoke a few words, expressing his pleasure at being present, and wishing the institutions every success. The entertainment was chiefly provided by the members. The party gave much pleasure, and was full of encouragement.

Middlesbrough.—On Sunday morning, March 19, the Co-operative Hall, which had been taken for the occasion by the Christ Church Congregation, was crowded to excess, when the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle. The sermon, which was well reported in the Northern Echo, dealt with the questions of peace and war, and denounced covetousness as the root of many evils. Referring to the Tear's proposal for disarmament, Mr. Brooke said he hoped something might come of it in the direction, at least, of arbitration. The war that Jesus proclaimed was spiritual. He was against all selfishness and lies and oppression and luxury, against pride and hatred, and injustice. To fighters for righteousness would come the peace of perfect obedience to perfect law.

Newark.—Last Sunday night the Rev. Rattenbury Hodges preached in the Free Christian Church on Sheldon's now famous religious novel, "In His Steps; or, What would Jesus do?" He heartily appreciated the moral purpose of the novel. It was fired with sacred enthusiasm. After outlining the story, he criticised its theological implications, and considered that its way of disposing of the difficulties involved in social problems was hard y within the bounds of probability. What would Jesus do were he in the United Kingdom to-day? He would not concern himself so much with the manifold fruits of the great evils in our midst, as with their roots. He would lay his axe at the roots of those Upas trees, whose every breath is poisoning the atmosphere of our land. He would strike at all the abuses bound up with the Land Laws, the Liquor Traffic, the Sweating System, and many other abuses. He would say, Sweep away these, and then the souls of your fellow-creatures will be more ready and fit to receive the purifying, uplifting, and saving influence of that Gospel which my Father gave me to deliver to mankind.

Scarborough.—On Monday evening, March 13, the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached to a crowded congregation in Westborough Church. The sermon was based upon the words, "Speak to the children of Israel that they go forward." The service was felt by one and all to be helpful, strengthening, and refreshing. A meeting of the literary and musical society was held in the schoolroom on Monday, March 20, when a very interesting and instructive lecture was given by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Hull, on "Soldier Poets." The lecture was illustrated by songs sung by members of the choir. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to lecturer and choir for so instructive and pleasant an evening.

South Ceshire and District Sunday School Union.—The winter meetings were held at Whitchurch on Wednesday, the 15th inst. The general committee met for the transaction of business in the vestry of the Church of the Saviour, Highgate, at two o'clock. At 3.30 a conference of teachers and friends was held in the schoolroom adjoining. Mrs. Myers, the president of the Union, occupied the chair, and called upon Mr. W. Vickery, of Shrewsbury, to read a paper on "Some Phases of Sunday-school Work." The paper was a very interesting and suggestive one, and provoked a lively and helpful discussion, in which the Revs. G. H. Smith, H. D. Roberts, J. C. Street, G. A. Payne, J. M. Mills, Mrs. Hill, and Dr. Harris, amongst others, took part. The conference was opened with the singing of the hymn, "Come Kingdom of our God," and prayer by the Rev. J. C. Street, and was closed with hymn and benediction. After tea in the schoolroom a public religious service was held in the church. A liturgical service was conducted by the Rev. W. F. Turland, and the sermon preached by the Rev. R. Stuart Redfern, which was an eloquent protest against the encroachments of sacerdotalism, the uncertain teaching of the Evangelical Free Church Catechism, and a plea for more earnest work in our Sunday-schools. The meetings were fairly well attended, all the schools in the Union being represented.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Thursday evening, March 2, a social evening with conversation, instrumental music, songs and recitations, was very pleasantly spent. On Wednesday, March 15, the Rev. C. Hargrove, of Leeds, lectured on "Salvation here and hereafter," to a good audience.

Stratford-on-Avon.—A noteworthy School Board election took place last week. The last contest was fifteen years ago, when a popular Roman Catholic layman headed the poll, followed by the vicar (Rev. G. Arbuthnot) and four Anglican laymen. A Nonconformist was elected at the bottom of the poll. Special interest was aroused in the town and in the Midlands generally by the recent contest, owing to the rejection by the Church majority of Miss Gold, a Unitarian teacher, solely on account of her religious belief. Her fitness was acknowledged by those who rejected her, until her Unitarianism was recognised. The introduction of the Apostles' Creed into the Board-school and other acts had also been strongly objected to by the Nonconformists of the town. It will be remembered that the Gold case prompted the course of theological lectures given in Stratford under the auspices of the Midland Christian Union, which resulted in the formation of the congregation now worshipping in the Free Christian Church, Tylor-street. The members of the congregation would, in any case, have taken great interest in the contest, but when their secretary (Mr. F. L. Talbot) was nominated as an Independent candidate, their interest was greatly intensified. The result of the election was a triumph for the cause of undogmatic education, in which liberal Churchmen took their full share. Mr. Talbot stood fourth in the list of seven successful candidates, two Nonconformists and the Roman Catholic candidate being ahead of him, and the three Churchmen behind. A fourth was rejected.

THROUGH religion God creates the order, works the progress, and achieves the good of mankind; and His agent or organ throughout is the religious man and society. From this point of view, everything that makes for human happiness and wholeness is of religion; whatever fears man's growth in freedom, in culture, in science, in everything meant by progress and civilisation, may be ecclesiastical, but is not religious.—A. M. Fairbairn.

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood, which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer of the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq. (President of the Provincial Assembly of London and S. E. Counties), Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

THE FIRST OF SPRING.

THE first of spring ! and yet 'neath winter's sway
The world remains ; and half-awakened flow'rs,
Dreaming of life, still hide in snowy low'rs,
While back to heaven the lark doth make his way.
O lovely winter, fair and yet forlorn,
Unloose the chains that bind the sleeping earth,
And spring shall wake, a thousand joys have birth,
And Nature with mankind keep Easter morn.

EDWARD TESCHEMACHER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ALTHOUGH dated, as usual, for Saturday, THE INQUIRER may this week reach our readers in London on Thursday evening, so that they may be reminded by the Calendar notice of the service on the morning of Good Friday at Effra-road Chapel, Brixton. There will also be service, we believe, at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead. On the morning of Easter Sunday the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., is to preach at Effra-road, Brixton, the service beginning at eleven o'clock.

AMONG the special contributions to our Easter number we are privileged to include part of a hitherto unpublished sermon for Easter by the late Dr. Sadler. Many of our readers will be glad to hear that a volume of Dr. Sadler's "Sermons and Hymns for Children" will shortly be published by Messrs. James Clarke and Co., and also that a volume of Communion Addresses and other papers and verses is to be printed for private circulation.

THE report of the Children's Flower Fund for last year records that about 527 boxes of flowers were sent during the spring and summer of 1898 to 54 elementary schools or departments of schools in London, being nearly double the number sent in the previous year. Six country schools undertook to send flowers, four of them being elementary schools, and in at least one instance the children of the country and town schools have exchanged pleasant letters. There is still need of further help, both in the matter of funds and of helpers in the country. The expenditure last year was £12 16s. 9d. Information as to the best methods of packing flowers, the times of sending, &c., will be given by Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, N.W., who will also be glad to receive subscriptions and the names of any who are willing to undertake to send flowers.

THE centenary of Haydn's "Creation," which was first publicly performed at Vienna, March 19, 1799, was celebrated on Saturday week by a performance at the Crystal Palace, and in many other places passages from the oratorio were rendered in commemoration. The "Creation," says the Athenæum critic, "still lives. It does not astonish, neither does it powerfully move us ; but the fresh, genial music is pleasant to listen to ; it speaks to us of that simplicity in art so much preached, but so little practised in these days." Haydn was nearly sixty-seven when he completed the "Creation," over which, although usually a rapid worker, he took nearly two years. He worked at it in a very earnest spirit. "Never was I so pious," he said, "as when composing the 'Creation.' I knelt down every day and prayed God to strengthen me for my work." Sunday week was the actual day of the centenary, and after evening service on that day at Effra-road Chapel, Brixton, some of our friends had the opportunity of hearing passages from the oratorio beautifully rendered.

The Guild work in Young Days for this year consists in "Talks about our Unitarian Faith," by the Editor, with stories and pictures of its leaders. Theophilus Lindsey, Priestley and Channing are the leaders dealt with in previous numbers, the beautiful portrait of Channing by Gambardella being reproduced in the March number. In the April number the talk is about the meaning of religion, and the story of Theodore Parker is told. There is a reproduction of part of the beautiful monument to Parker in Boston, the grave-stone at Florence, and the well-known portrait of him at the age of thirty-six. We trust that these "Talks," admirable as Mr. Wright is so well able to make them, will be widely read and will receive the attention from our young people which they certainly deserve.

AN interesting historical sketch of the Memorial Hall, Manchester, has been drawn up by Mr. Harry Rawson, the chairman of the trustees, and is now printed. The Hall was founded in commemoration of the two thousand ejected ministers of 1662, at the time of the bicentenary of their faithful witness. The first circular in connection with the movement was issued in December, 1861, by Dr. J. R. Beard and others, and in March, 1862, it was determined on the motion of Mr. R. D. Darbishire, seconded by Mr. R. M. Shipman, that the Hall should be erected, "to be settled on perfectly open trusts for religious, philanthropic and educational purposes." In June, 1864, the corner stone was laid by Alderman Mackie, and in January, 1866, the Hall was opened, the trust-deed being signed in the following March. Among the original trustees was the present chairman, to whom we are indebted for this valuable record.

THE papers have reported a legacy of £1,500 bequeathed by Mr. Williams, a young solicitor of Swansea, to the University College, Aberystwith, for a scholarship "to be held by a student of Welsh nationality, but not a Unitarian or a Roman Catholic." The college authorities think that the religious disqualifications are contrary to the terms of their Charter ; and Mr. Justice North, sitting in Chancery, has given them a month to decide what course they will take. Mr. Williams is said to have been a Congregationalist, and a Liberal in politics ; but it would seem from this bequest to have been a liberalism of doubtful quality. The Aberystwith College was more fortunate in another bequest which we recently reported of £1,000 from the late Mr. W. Roberts of Manchester, unspoiled by any such sectarian limitation.

DR. RICHARD GARNETT'S retirement from the Keepership of Printed Books at the British Museum has been marked by many expressions of gratitude and high appreciation from those best able to measure the value of his services. The fifteen years of his service as Superintendent of the Reading Room earned for him the gratitude of innumerable students, and his Keepership, during the last nine years, is memorable for the progress made with the great "Author-Catalogue." But the Athenæum regards his tenure of office as hardly less remarkable for his success in the acquisition of fine books. Five Caxtons, thirteen books printed by Wynkyn de Worde, a number of Elizabethan rarities, the fourth German Bible, the first illustrated Malermi Bible (1490), and the first and second editions of the "Decamerone" are among the treasures he has added to the library. A Committee has been formed for the purpose of presenting Dr. Garnett with his portrait. Among those who have joined it are Mr. Leslie Stephen (chairman), Lord Acton, Canon Ainger, Dr. S. R. Gardiner, Mr. Frederic Harrison, the Right Hon. W. E. H. Lecky, the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Oxford. Mr. Sidney Lee and Mr. Seccombe are the secretaries, Mr. A. H. Huth the treasurer.

Among the verses published in Mr. Stead's War against War, some of the most striking have been the two following sonnets by Canon Rawnsley:—

The Peace Conference.

Nor since the day, in Bethlehem's cavern-shrine,
When those three kings knelt humbly to adore,
Have earthly monarchs learnt a nobler lore
Or princes met for counsel more Divine.
Far hence I see the murderous battle-line
Melt, and the gentle ships from shore to shore
Pass fearless, barrack bugles sound no more,
And men in fruitful brotherhood combine.
Wherefore War-weary, praying War shall cease,
Yet still for Peace pursuing endless War,
Ye burdened nations to the Christ-Child kneel!
Unbar your visors, sheathe the hungry steel,
Thank God for Love's ambassador, the Tsar,
And tender homage to the Prince of Peace.

At St. Martin's Hall, March 21, 1899.

MEN say a soldier-knight at Amiens gate
In mercy cleft his War-cloak with his sword
To clothe a beggar—knowing not the Lord—
Thereby, found Christ; forsook his warrior state
And preached God's love. Is Martin out of date?
Or vainly must the nation's hungry horde
Ask men at arms some succour to afford
And they pass heedless, uncompassionate?
Nay, for in Europe—long time won to Christ—
Where still the vines, that are His symbol, flower,
Where in the wind the olive still is white,
At last with War shall Reason hold her tryst,
And patriot Love—the true cosmopolite—
Shall claim for all the world St. Martin's dower.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE OF DOMESTIC MISSION WORKERS.

"To me this ministry is peculiarly interesting, regarded as the beginning of a series of operations for banishing from society its chief calamity and reproach, and for changing the face of the civilised and Christian world.

"This horrible contrast of condition, which all large cities present, has existed too long. Shall it endure for ever?

"We have lived comfortably, perhaps luxuriously, in our dwellings, whilst within a stone's throw were fellow-creatures, the children of our Father in heaven, as nobly born and gifted as ourselves, in whose countenances might be read brutal ignorance, hopeless misery, and degrading vice.

"Poor there will be, but they need not, must not, exist as a degraded hopeless caste. They need not, must not, be cut off from the brotherhood of humanity. Their children must not be left to inherit and propagate their crimes and woes. To put an end to such a class is the highest office of Christian philanthropy. Do you ask how it is to be done? I answer, Christianity has wrought mighty revolutions, and in these we have an earnest of what it is able and destined to accomplish. Let us bring this into new contact with the poor. Let us send forth men imbued with its spirit to preach it to the poor, and, still more, to study poverty in all its forms, that the moral pestilence which has so long ravaged the Christian world may at last be stayed."

It is calculated to make us pause, in the swell and strut with which it has become fashionable to speak of the achievements of this "wonderful century," that these words, so true in their presentation of facts, so convincing in their appeal to the highest emotions of our common humanity, were spoken in 1835. They are taken from a sermon preached by Dr. Channing to the Benevolent Fraternity of churches at Boston, on the occasion of its first anniversary.* It is possible, though difficult to believe, that the problem may have been more flagrant and glaring because so little had been attempted up to that time in the way of amelioration. But it is unquestionably true that these words come with as thrilling an appeal to-day, because we are sensible that not only does the problem still exist, but that it is vaster, more complex, and being more generally realised, all the more urgent to be dealt with by those who have their brothers' welfare at heart.

In the domain of morals and religion, no less than in politics, it is necessary to note particularly the scale by which we are measuring the importance of varying facts. Measured by the vast plane of the problem sought to be solved, or at least dealt with both in 1835 and to-day, the few small institutions known in about a dozen cities as Domestic Missions must appear very puny and feeble replies to the appeal of Channing's prophetic word.

But looked at from the interior working of these institutions, and measured by the worth of individual souls reclaimed to righteousness, to self-respect, to society, and to God, it is impossible to over-estimate the value of the labours of those who, working in obscure and quiet ways, and courting little public attention, have, nevertheless, accomplished much in the dark places of humanity's sorest need.

As our readers already know, a Conference on the subject of Domestic Missions is to be held in Liverpool on Tuesday and Wednesday, April 18 and 19, in the rooms of the Mission House at Mill-street.

Judging by the programme before us, there will be no lack of interesting matter for discussion, which cannot fail to be of service to those who in various parts of the country are engaged in similar duties, confronted by similar difficulties, aiming at the same ideals. The Conference is to commence on Tuesday afternoon by a reception of the visitors at 2.30, followed at 3 by a paper on "The Development of a Mission Congregation," by the Rev. Wilfred Harris (secretary of the Manchester Domestic Mission Society), whose name is sufficient guarantee for an able and earnest treatment of the deepest and the highest work of a domestic missionary. The evening meeting will be devoted to "Old and New Methods of Work," and will be opened by Mr. W. J. Clark, of Birmingham. A glance at the report of Hurst-street Domestic Mission will show that this cannot fail to be interesting and suggestive. Wednesday's Conference commences at 10.30 A.M. with a devotional service, to be followed at 11 by a meeting, which, it is hoped, will be presided over by Mr. William Rathbone. The subject for discussion is "Domestic Missions and their Relations to Charity Organisation and other Kindred Agencies." The paper opening the discussion will be read by a Liverpool layman. The afternoon Conference will be concerned with the great subject of Temperance. The chair is to be taken by Alderman Bowring, J.P., and a paper on "The Drink Curse, and How to Deal with It" will be read by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, to be followed by discussion.

In the evening Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., and Lady Brunner will hold a reception in the large hall of the mission, to which all visitors and friends who have been attending the Conference will be invited. A few speeches from some of the leaders present may be expected.

The Committee who have the arrangements for the Conference in charge desire it to be understood that, while they are inviting all those living at any distance from Liverpool who are interested in Domestic Mission work and desirous to attend, they will be very pleased indeed to see any friends, whether actually invited or not, who can make it convenient to attend. The Conference is not confined to those who are actually engaged in the work of these institutions, but is open to all who desire the great work, which they have been established and maintained to promote, carried on with as great earnestness and devotion as has been witnessed during the sixty years of their history. REVIVING LIFE.

THE re-appearing leaf-buds on all the trees, miraculous in beauty, infinite in number, and the response of every leaping heart at the sight, remind us that the Life that had ebbed through autumn and winter is returning, flowing and bursting through every barrier, like the flood tide. Strange, rich, miraculous life, which our hearts welcome each year as something divine, and to which they respond each year with an unmistakable experience of genuine delight. God links us to Himself by natural homage, so to speak: He secures our hearts. And though we flatter ourselves, it may be, at first, on our reason and intellect, on our judgment and opinions about God, thinking that we are thus forging the strongest bond of attachment to Him, yet, as the years flee, and the spring returning is ever more precious, and we welcome it ever more tenderly and from the heart, we begin to see that a golden bond has already held us all along, and then our own poor forged chains, made to bind us to Him, lest He should escape us, begin to be neglected, the links snap, through weakness or through rust. What matters? Why did we ever think it was needful to forge such weak, human chains to bind us to God? The everlasting arms were beneath us and about us. What other bond was needed?

We find at length there can be no self-delusion—where our treasure is, there will our heart be also. We are like the Catholics, if I may compare small things with great, who, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, being bidden to worship in the Church of England, sent to Rome to know the pleasure of his Holiness the Pope. He returned for answer: "Tell the Catholics in England to give me their hearts, and the Queen may take the rest." Beyond this, indeed, speaks the Divine Life to us: "You cannot but give me your hearts, and for the rest, My thoughts are not your thoughts, nor my ways your ways. Your proofs of my existence or non-existence, your justifications of my ways to men, what are they but mere fine-spun cobwebs, which one strong heart-pulsation of delight in the universal self-evident Life with its mystery, its power and its beauty, sweeps clean away? Have I not created you to love me, not to comprehend me?"

And with the years, surely, deep answers unto deep, the deep things of the spirit of man to the deep things of God—our own life being thus a reviving, re-appearing life unfolding more and more its inner nature, its endless capacity for apprehension and delight. With every unfolding of ourselves comes a new revelation of the Divine Life, an unfolding of our self's Self. The more we learn, the more we have to learn, the more we need to learn, the more there is to learn—about the flower in the crannied wall, and the primrose on the river's brim.

A tale is told of a Jesuit Father, who late in life became an accomplished naturalist, having been moved to commence the study of Nature on this wise: "He was very ill; and while meditating on what he believed would prove his death-bed, this thought came into his mind:—'I am going, as I humbly hope, to heaven, but how little do I know of the glory of the earth I am about to leave.' His ignorance of earth shocked him as he was about to pass from it for ever. Contrary to his expectation, he recovered; and he then devoted himself to gaining more knowledge of the marvellous works of God, stretched around him in boundless profusion, as the best preparation for enjoying the majesty of the Heaven to come." If every returning spring, as it renews the earth and speaks of the everlasting glory of Divine Life, could find us renewing our mind—finding new things to love and admire in old things, and what is older than the spring?—then should we learn what the Apostle meant by speaking of going from strength to strength and from glory to glory. Though every spring we catch a glimpse of the gleam of the golden bond, and feel the thrill of the touch of the everlasting arms about us, yet it is but slowly we seem to realise whither the glimpse and the thrill would lead us—are leading us. Walsingham, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, once wrote to Lord Burleigh: "We have lived long enough to our country, to our fortunes, and to our Sovereign; it is high time that we began to live for ourselves and to God." It was as if he had begun to perceive that the tide of the Divine Life in him had ebbed far away from his daily life, and was now feeling the inevitable attractive force drawing it to itself. The dust of mortality gathers about the walls and windows of the soul's house, and periodically, as the insect casts off its chrysalis, and the serpent its wrinkled skin, it seems bidden also to cast off the darkening and defiling signs of mortality, that make us forget that the life we live we live (if we normally lived) to God. Or is this, perhaps, not a fitter parable of the desecrating touch of the worldly life upon the Christ that would arise from the dead within us?

We read that "when the church of the Eternal Wisdom at Constantinople was captured by the hosts of Islam, and turned into a mosque, the great mosaic figure of the Christ enthroned in glory over the East was defaced and blotted with paint. But as the years went by, the imperishable mosaic wore its way, so to say, through the fading veil, and the calm face once more looked down upon those who bowed beneath." So is it when, after the vain endeavour of living to ourselves, and bringing against our highest and best and divinest nature the barbarous hosts of our headstrong will and unbridled passions and having felt at enmity with the calm monitor within us and above us, we endeavour to deface and blot it out. As gradually, almost as miraculously as the new life appears in spring under the black, dead disguise of winter, appear little gleams of our new life, our true life, from time to time, as a little of the futile paint has yielded to the wearing and corroding power of time, and at length, our hostility gradually ceasing, the hidden nobler self appears in its pristine splendour, to teach us and to draw us to live no longer to ourselves alone, but to God. The salvation of men lies, indeed, in this their strange recuperative power, their capacity for renewing their life and renewing their mind. Childhood and youth are often compared to the spring, but it almost seems truer to compare spring to that period of life in most people that appears when much of the storm and stress of life has passed, when from beneath a dark and gloomy landscape, which we have made of our lives, with its dull hues and leafless forms, devastated by harsh and bitter and cold experiences of the old life, of the old Adam, there appear signs of a new life, of the Christ in each of us, of the new Adam, the re-birth of the spirit, when faith and hope and love begin to burgeon into leaf and flower and fruit, in forms and colours quite other than the frail, pale things of our childhood and our youth. And we begin to comprehend the meaning of the words uttered of him who came that we might have life and have it abundantly—"the life that he liveth he liveth unto God."

OUR CHILDHOOD'S GARDEN.

Do you remember, dear, the garden old,
The garden where our happy childhood passed?
Look back across the years that since have flown;
Look back and see the joys that we have known
In days before our locks so white had grown,
In days when mine were brown and yours were gold.
Look back and see that garden thro'
the veil that Time has cast.

In June it was a maze of colours gay.
Fragrant in one dear nook white jasmine bloomed;
Another was a tangle of sweet peas,
And in and out the blossoms went the bees;
The jasmine petals floated on the breeze.
There you and I would roam in gladsome play,
The air that moved about us with those subtle scents perfumed.

Do you remember how fell winter's breath
Slew all our flowers? The joys of long ago Lie withered with them. Cold is now the sod
That nursed those flowers, where our footsteps trod:
The stark bare trees stretch out their arms to God,
And all around I see a world of death
Where once was that bright world of life basking in summer's glow.

But, dear, do you forget, when we had grown
So weary of the cold, how winter fled,
And spring's soft voice called primroses to birth,
And violets adorned the wakening
earth?
Was not our joy the waiting time well worth
When by the wall we found some snowdrops blown,
And crocus cups drew chains of gold around the garden bed?

Did we not find our treasures newly made Each resurrection time? And shall we fear
To lose for aye the loves and hopes of yore
Because to-day life's field is frozen o'er?
Has not grim winter come and gone before?
So let us trust that when this wintry shade
Is past, we'll find in bloom elsewhere the flowers that faded here.

Easter, 1899. THEODORA MILLS.

ARNOBIUS.—IV.

ARNOBIUS has no doubt as to the evil effects of purchasing the remission of sins. He argues that if the gods could be angry with sins, it is the part of the gods "to forgive the sins of the guilty without any price or reward. But if this cannot be, it would be much wiser, that they should continue obstinately offended, than that they should be softened by being corrupted with bribes. For the multitude increases of those who sin, when there is hope given of paying for their sin; and there is little hesitation to do wrong, when the favour of those who pardon our offences can be bought" (VII. c. 8). It is interesting to observe that Arnobius knows nothing apparently of the Old Testament nor of the sacrificial system of the Jewish Law. If he had, it is certain that he would not have regarded it as typical of the sacrifice of Christ.

As he demurred to the allegorical interpretation of heathen myths, he would have been sure to have objected to the interpretation of the heathen sacrifices as typical of the sacrifice of Christ. But in the case of Christ there was no death, no suffering, and therefore no sacrifice. Christ himself did not die upon the cross, but "only the human form which he had put on, and which he wore about him" (I. c. 62). Nor was it possible that Christ should suffer. "What man does not see that that which is immortal cannot be subject to any pain; that that, on the contrary, cannot be immortal which does suffer pain."

Arnobius did not believe in the everlasting punishment of the wicked, because he did not believe that the soul of man was necessarily immortal. "The souls of men are of a neutral character, inasmuch as they have been produced by secondary beings, made subject to the law of death, of little strength, perishable; they are gifted with immortality, if they have faith in God Supreme who alone has power to grant such blessings, by putting away corruption" (II. c. 53).

"It is the right of Christ alone to give salvation to souls and assign them everlasting life. . . . Souls can receive from no one life and salvation, except from him to whom the Supreme Ruler gave this charge and duty. This is the door of life, by him alone there is access to the light; nor may men either creep in or enter elsewhere, all other ways being shut up and secured by an impenetrable barrier" (II. c. 65). "By no efforts will you be able to reach the prize of immortality; unless, by Christ's gift, you have perceived what constitutes this immortality, and have been allowed to enter on the true life" (II. c. 66.) "The knowledge of God is a kind of vital heaven" (II. c. 32). "Unless you give yourselves to seek to know the Supreme God, a cruel death awaits you when freed from the bonds of the body; not bringing sudden annihilation, but destroying by the bitterness of its grievous and long-protracted punishment" (II. c. 61). And it is interesting to note that he declares that people have ceased to believe in the infernal regions, without making any reference to the Christian hell. It is his opinion that "the reasoning holds good that the infernal regions are an utterly vain and empty name, and that under the earth there are no Plutonian realms and abodes" (VII. c. 20), just as Juvenal (II. 149-152) had said "not even children believe that there are any manes and subterranean realms."

Arnobius protests, on many grounds, against the use of incense in divine worship. We may think that the gods are honoured thereby, but it is not a question "of what is done by you, but how much the gods value what is done by you." With respect to the use of idols, it may be well to premise that the gods of the heathen must either have been embodied or unembodied spirits; and that, if embodied, they must either have had bodies like or unlike those of men. Now if they were unembodied spirits, it was obviously misleading to men, and degrading to the god, to represent him under any form whatever. If they were embodied in a form unlike that of man, there was still a misrepresentation. The opponents of Arnobius contended that idols were to be worshipped because their dedication caused the gods to dwell in them, to which Arnobius replies:—"Do your gods then dwell in gypsum and in figures of earthenware? Nay, rather, are the gods the minds, spirits, and souls of figures of earthenware and of gypsum? and, that the meanest things may be able to become of greater importance, do they suffer themselves to be shut up and concealed and confined in an obscure abode?" (VI. c. 17). If the gods are embodied in human form, then they can only be present in one place at a time. "Is it possible that there can be at one time one god in several images, or, again, divided into parts by his being cut up? For let us suppose that there are ten thousand images of Vulcan in the whole world; is it possible at all, as I said, that at one time one deity can be in all the ten thousand? I do not think so" (VI. c. 19). Hence "it must either be said and confessed that there are Vulcans without number, if we decide that he exists and is in all the images; or he will be in none (in one only?) because he is prevented by nature from being divided among several" (VI. c. 19).

When we consider these things, we are tempted to ask what are the principal points of M. Glaire's religion, which Arnobius did defend. It seems to me probable, that Arnobius was converted to an heretical, rather than an orthodox, Christianity. Manichæism was widely diffused in North Africa at the close of the third century, and Arnobius shows considerable sympathy with some of its views, if he does not adopt all its dogmas. The Manichæans built no temples, raised no altars, carved and worshipped no idols, indulged in no imposing ceremonies. Pure and simple prayer was their only form of adoration. We find Arnobius protesting against temples, idols, and sacrifices; and he represents the Christians as offering fervent prayer to the Supreme Being. He says it is their custom "to adore God as the highest existence, as the Lord of all things that be, as occupying the highest place among all exalted ones, to pray to Him with respectful submission in our distresses, to cling to Him with all our senses, so to speak, to love Him, to look up to Him with faith" (I. c. 25). It was the opinion of the Manichæans that Christ assumed a form apparently human. "They did not celebrate the birth of Christ, for of his birth they denied the reality; their paschal feast, as they equally disbelieved the reality of Christ's passion, though kept holy, had little of the Christian form." The diet of the Manichæans was fruit and herbs; they shrank with abhorrence from animal food; they abstained altogether from wine. At the Eucharist, Dean Milman says, they probably used pure water, or water mingled with raisins. Arnobius, as we have seen, shows considerable sympathy with this vegetarianism and teetotalism of the olden time.

It only remains for us to consider how far the teachings of Arnobius are in harmony with modern thought. He sometimes represents the Supreme Being as the God of the stoical philosophy rather than of the Christian religion. Well, the first article of the Church of England describes God as "without passions"; and I know some heretics who decline to attribute human affections to the Deity, while they do not hesitate to pray to Him as our Father who is in heaven. Arnobius taught that God was not the creator of the human race—not our Father. Men were such weak creatures, that some secondary God must have been their creator. With fine irony he says—God is our Father: we are pure emanations from the Supreme Spirit; and therefore, of course, "we live unblameably; are good, just and upright; in nothing depraved; no passion overpowers us; no lust degrades us. And because all our souls have one origin, we therefore think exactly alike; we do not differ in manners, we do not differ in beliefs; we all know God, and there are not as many opinions as there are men in the world, nor are these divided in infinite variety." And the translator adds, in a note:—"Arnobius considers the reductio ad absurdum so very plain that he does not trouble himself to state his argument more directly" (II. c. 15).

The startling assertion that God did not create man is not so alien from modern thought as it might at first appear. It means that the soul of man does not come as a pure emanation from the Supreme God. How man came into existence, and by whom he was created, Arnobius leaves an open question; which modern science answers with the theory of Evolution. Neither our remotest ancestors, nor even ourselves, are born God-like; but we have to make ourselves so; and, if we can, to Move upward, working out the beast

And let the ape and tiger die.

Arnobius teaches that men are born into a divine life through believing and practising the truth declared by Christ. Truth is a species of vital leaven. This is an aspect of Christianity with which some of us are not unfamiliar. The Christianity of many consists in the belief that Christ was the preacher of a pure Theism. The adherence to the teachings and the personality of Christ as a teacher sent from God, above all other beliefs, is also not unknown at the present time. The conviction that sin is a weakness which can be outgrown, and that we are not to be paralysed by remorse for the past, but rather to live to God in the present; that sorrow and difficulty are opportunities of spiritual culture; that our religion should be a religion of joy rather than sorrow—all which follow from the faith of Arnobius, has its adherents at the present time.

The doctrine of conditional immortality may not be generally accepted nowadays; but, at any rate, it has something to be said in its favour. Arnobius taught that we were not to consider that we were doing God a great favour in allowing ourselves to be saved; that God did not unduly press the matter; He left us free to choose between life and death. If we are apathetic and do not care to live a good life here, why should we wish for an endless life hereafter? If we are always debating whether life is worth living, who would wish to continue that debate throughout eternity? If, on the contrary, we value life, and the joy of it quickens our pulses, and the thought of its mystery sanctifies our spirits; if that life has become divine through the knowledge of God, which Christ was sent to proclaim, then for us the door of immortal life stands always open; then against us the everlasting gates are never barred.

Such are the theological tenets of Arnobius. I venture to think that they are calculated to develope spiritual joy and purity and strength in the hearts of those who adopt them. They are entirely free from any morbid treatment of sin and sorrow. They bid us to walk in the spirit of Christ's teachings, so that we may not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. They encourage us to "receive with meekness the engrafted word which is able to save our souls." They enforce that godliness which has the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come.

CHARLES C. COE.

LITERATURE.

HUMAN IMMORTALITY.*

THIS little book contains the lecture delivered last year by Professor James under the Ingersoll Trust, instituted by the late Miss Caroline Haskell Ingersoll in memory of her father, who was a graduate of Harvard University. The Trust provides for the annual delivery of a lecture on the "Immortality of Man," and in undertaking the duty last year, Professor James clearly defined the purpose and scope of his lecture. He does not range over the whole subject, but, as the title of his little book indicates, he states and deals with two definite objections to the doctrine of Immortality, and in an Appendix adds some interesting and valuable notes. As Professor of Philosophy and a skilled psychologist, he does not speak without authority, and the lecture will be welcomed by many whose thought has been perplexed by the questions here so ably dealt with.

The first objection is very widely felt, not only by professional physiologists, but by those who are influenced by the popular scientific teaching of the day, and go no further than the threshold of the question. Matter and a materialist view of life are naturally the first suggestion of physical science, but deeper thought shows that this is not the final word. Thought is in our present life indissolubly connected with the brain. If the brain is diseased, thought goes astray; if the brain is destroyed, thought and life at any rate appear to be at an end. And this is the confident assertion of the materialist, with which Professor James first deals. He asks his hearers to assume the truth of the familiar physiological formula: Thought is a function of the brain; and he then faces the difficulty thus presented, by inquiring what "function" really means in this case, and whether the materialist conclusion, which seems to be involved, is inevitable. The answer which Professor James gives is that such is by no means the case:—

The fatal consequence is not coercive, the conclusion which materialism draws being due solely to its one-sided way of taking the word "function." And, whether we care or not for immortality in itself, we ought, as mere critics doing police duty among the vagaries of mankind, to insist on the illogicality of a denial based on the flat ignoring of a palpable alternative. How much more ought we to insist, as lovers of truth, when the denial is that of such a vital hope of mankind!

When science asks the question how thought arises in connection with the brain, although that connection is clearly demonstrated, she is faced by one of the ultimate mysteries of life. There is no reason for saying that the physical substance of the brain produces thought, as a kettle of water produces steam when it is boiled; and Professor James shows that the "function" of the brain may be regarded as transmissive rather than productive—that is to say, while thought in our human life is exercised through the instrumentality of the brain, it does not follow that it has not a higher and spiritual origin. Thus a better image than the steaming kettle to describe the function of the brain, is that of an organ with its pipes and key-board, which determines the manner in which air shall pass through to produce the music, but does not itself make the music, which is in the action of the air itself.

What form our spiritual life may take apart from this mortal body and the brain by means of which we now do our thinking, we cannot say, and into this further question Professor James does not enter. His point is simply that there is no good ground in the physiology of the brain for denial of the essential spiritual nature of man and of the continuance of his spiritual life after the death of the body. Personal power, knowledge and love we may think of as compassing our life about in God who is the eternal, ever-present Spirit; and through the organ of our body with its sensitive brain our own personal spiritual life, which is of God, enters into the activities of this world, and yet is by no means confined in its destiny to these earthly conditions. Such is the conclusion we draw from Professor James's dealing with the first difficulty he discusses.

The second is of an altogether different character, and is due to the oppression of the imagination, when we try to think of the limitless number of immortal beings involved in this doctrine. Formerly, Professor James points out, the inhabitants of heaven were thought of as a select circle, not difficult to grasp in imagination; but now all such limits are broken. Yet the difficulty is of our own creation, and is due simply to our feebleness of mind, and partly to our want of sympathy with the lives of others, far removed from our own immediate circle. But such difficulty cannot affect the Eternal, whose goodness cares for all. And so Professor James adds:—

I hope now that you agree with me that the tiresomeness of an over-peopled heaven is a purely subjective and illusory notion, a sign of human incapacity, a remnant of the old narrow-hearted aristocratic creed. "Revere the Maker, lift thine eye up to His style and manners of the sky," and you will believe that this is indeed a democratic universe, in which your paltry exclusions play no regulative part. Was your taste consulted in peopling this globe? How, then, should it be consulted as to the peopling of the vast City of God? Let us put our hand over our mouth, like Job, and be thankful that in our personal littleness we ourselves are here at all. The Deity that suffers us, we may be sure, can suffer many another queer and wondrous and only half-delightful thing.

And the lecture concludes:—

The heart of being can have no exclusions akin to those which our poor little hearts set up. The inner significance of other lives exceeds all our powers of sympathy and insight. If we feel a significance in our own life which would lead us spontaneously to claim its perpetuity, let us be at least tolerant of like claims made by other lives, however numerous, however unideal they may seem to us to be. Let us at any rate not decide adversely on our own claim, whose grounds we feel directly, because we cannot decide favourably on the alien claims, whose grounds we cannot feel at all. That would be letting blindness lay down the law to sight.

Professor James's lecture opens the way for an assured faith, and while not proceeding further, makes it clear how that faith must be found in the present spiritual life with God.

BLANCO WHITE.*

MORE than fifty years ago the three volumes of the "Life of the Rev. Joseph Blanco White," largely autobiographical, were published by his literary executor, the late Rev. John Hamilton Thom. In 1835 his "Observations on Heresy and Orthodoxy" first appeared, to the second edition of which, in 1839, he prefixed a letter of dedication to the Unitarians of Liverpool. This book is still to be had in the reprint of 1877, with a brief memoir by Mr. Thom, and to this we are glad that Mr. Harwood's little book may now be added. It is well that renewed attention should be called to Blanco White, because of his noble nature and the quiet heroism of his life, and especially at this time of controversy in the Church, when the claims of sacerdotalism are so persistently and persuasively urged upon our people. For Blanco White was brought up in a Roman Catholic home, in the land of the Inquisition, and was himself a priest, until through bitter sufferings he achieved spiritual freedom, and became a witness to the power of a reasonable faith.

The selections from "The Rationalist à Kempis" may be disappointing to those who have been led to expect too much from the title; but these meditations, written towards the close of their author's life, when he was a martyr to the most grievous bodily sufferings, furnish glimpses of his inmost thought and of the conflicts through which he had passed, which may be of real service to others, and certainly have a personal interest for those who are attracted to the man. But apart from these selections the little book is worth having for the sake of the memoir. Mr. Harwood has told the story of Blanco White's life with sympathetic insight. The picture of his youth as a Roman Catholic, of his dedication to the priesthood, and of the steps by which he gained his liberty, is of painful interest. And it is a pathetic feature in this man's life, that he was twice called upon to make a great renunciation. For when he came to this country from Spain he was received by the best men in the Church of England and at Oxford, and was held in honour for the confession he had made. But soon he felt the orthodoxy of the Church of England to be also an intolerable bondage, and from a circle of warm friends, and the household of Archbishop Whately, he went again into exile, and came as a solitary man to Liverpool. There as a Unitarian and a Rationalist he found new friends, and a peace of mind he had never known before. What it meant to him may be seen in this little book, and more fully in the larger "Life." We trust that Mr. Harwood's memoir may lead many new readers to that work, so rich in interest and healthy stimulus to a free and reverent religious life.

Even if everything else that Blanco White wrote should be forgotten, his one sonnet will remain among the treasures of our English literature, a sonnet of which Coleridge said that it was "the finest and most grandly conceived" in the language.

It is very familiar, and yet we will not refuse this opportunity of including it in our Easter number:—

Mysterious Night! when our first Parent knew Thee, from report divine, and heard Thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely Frame,
This glorious canopy of Light and Blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting
Flame,
Hesperus with the Host of Heaven came,
And lo! Creation widened in man's view.
Who could have thought such Darkness lay concealed Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find,
Whilst fly, and leaf, and insect stood revealed,
That to such countless Orbs thou mad'st us blind!
Why do we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

SIR,—In Mr. Charlesworth's "Provincial Letter" from the Midlands, which you published last week, occurs the following:—"It is passing strange for some of us who have come from the orthodox denominations to find the spirit of dogmatism eager to stamp the Free Churches."

This was written because Mr. Grosvenor Lee had ventured to suggest the addition of the word Unitarian in the title of the Midland Christian Union.

One cannot help feeling sorry for Mr. Charlesworth. To have his "calm atmosphere disturbed by the blowing of a keen wind"; to find the charming spring in which he has been living suddenly marred by "the snow of denominationalism being flung upon him"; and, to crown all, to have "a glacier banged into his temperate zone," this, surely, was enough to upset any man, and especially one "not used to it."

I confess to an entire sympathy with Mr. Grosvenor Lee, and I shall watch with considerable interest the melting process which Mr. Charlesworth predicts for the "glacier," under the influence of the "sun," that is to prove "a little too strong for it."

I do not believe there is any danger of "Stamping our Free Churches with the spirit of dogmatism," by the addition of the word Unitarian in the title of the Union.

On the other hand, I do believe it would tend to consolidate the organisation, and people would then know better what it was they were asked to support, and the kind of work the Union was doing.

It amazes me to hear sometimes ministers of Unitarian congregations go out of their way to disparage and belittle the name Unitarian, as though they were thoroughly ashamed of it. Unfortunately this is sometimes done where the church or congregation is the recipient of grants from Unitarian sources.

For myself, I find Unitarianism embraces all that I have learnt to value and hold dear, since I have had the privilege of being connected with the body, and to me it would seem cowardly and unmanly not to avow myself a Unitarian.

I know that ministers sometimes say, "I personally am a Unitarian, but I am not a Unitarian minister, and the church of which I am minister is not a Unitarian congregation."

All these subtleties which the average man and woman neither understands nor appreciates.

It does not necessarily bind or fix a congregation—or, to quote Mr. Charlesworth, "Stamps them with the spirit of dogmatism"—because they are described as Unitarian, any more than the Presbyterian congregations were stamped with the spirit of dogmatism by the use of the word Presbyterian.

Shrewsbury, March, 27, 1899.

[If with wearisome re-iteration we must once more go through this discussion over names, it may be worth while at the outset to quote the classical passage from Dr. Martineau's address at the Leeds Conference in 1888: "If any one, being a Unitarian, shrinks, on fitting occasion, from plainly calling himself so, he is a sneak and a coward. If, being of our Catholic communion, he calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors" ("Suggestions on Church Organisation," p. 30). And might it not be once for all admitted, that on neither side in this controversy is there any question of being "ashamed" of the Unitarian name, or of desiring to appear other than we are.—ED. NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGE ACT.

SIR,—I fear your recent editorial note and previous letters in THE INQUIRER may unduly discourage our congregations in considering the adoption of this Act.

It may be that the better reform would have been to require the attendance of the civil representative at all marriages, but, as things are, I think in the interest of the members of our congregations, and as removing a marked distinction between marriages in our chapels and those in the Established Church, we should give the Act a fair trial. The rules look rather formidable, but, in reality, they only set forth the formalities which our ministers now adopt in keeping their registers, and as we have an "educated ministry" I think the rules should present no difficulty to them.

There may, of course, be cases where it will not be considered worth while to adopt the Act, but, as advocates of civil and religious equality, I hope we shall not as a denomination (if I may use that term) allow the Act to become a dead letter.

THE LONDON BAZAAR.

SIR,—The present appears to be an important moment in relation to the coming bazaar. What stalls may be wanted? This affects the question of the selection of a hall. London, the seat of Empire, with its teeming population, must always be of absorbing interest to the whole British people; to the thoughtful among them, the religious needs of the masses require the most serious consideration, yet with regret do we find a Unitarian church established only here and there. May we not expect all Unitarians throughout the country to give their support to the bazaar to make it a success, and thus provide funds for promulgating the religious views we are so anxious to further? Our London churches are already stirring themselves, and great attractions may be expected; what a much grander effect would result with the aid of the manufacturing interest wherever Unitarian views are warmly held! With many, it could be made a matter of proper business advertisement, and some even would be glad to pay for the space they required, and a grand effort all round would show to the world that although almost lost sight of in London, we are yet an influential people; we want the Unitarian faith to be known, and this faith in itself deserves all possible publicity.

A concentration of industry provided by our manufacturing friends, aided by their friends, could not fail to provide an excellent collection of all sorts of things, and all of us, both town and country people, would flock to see the sight. Manchester has already led the way; may we hope that other important seats of manufacture will follow suit? It is invidious, perhaps, to mention the names of towns, because some that should be included in the list may be omitted, but I will mention a few in alphabetical order—namely, Birmingham, Bolton, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Leeds, Liverpool, Northampton, Nottingham, the Potteries, Sheffield and Stourbridge (glassware). Why should there not be a Scotch, an Irish (Belfast alone could furnish a stall of its own) and a Welsh Exhibit, and county exhibits from England, should towns wish to combine?

It would be worth while to organise large country excursions—it will be the year 1900, a splendid opportunity for a new departure. The bazaar only needs a general support to create real enthusiasm all round.

BERNARD LEWIS.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Psalms and Litanies of Rowland Williams.

I THOUGHT in waking upon the Lord, who is my deliverer for ever.

Thou hast ordered in their courses sun and moon, the stars and the realm of light. Days and weeks, months and years, answer to Thy will, and are witnesses of Thy bounty for ever.

O Thou hope of all holy and humble men of heart, and the Saviour of them that trust in Thee in time of trouble, give us not over as captives, in spiritual chains, but recover us, that we may awake to do Thy will.

The good that they would, weak men do not; the evil that they would not, they do. They consent to the law in word and thought; they shrink from holiness in deed. The grace of God delivers from this body of death, and, where sinfulness abounded, makes the strength of holiness to abound.

Lord, whose goodness makes the repentant strong, give us a true repentance in heart and life. Enough of putting a lawless will for Thy law, and of going into a far country from Thy face.

Deny me not, O Lord, before I die, the knowledge of Thy truth, to my soul's health, and to the deliverance of men into a holy freedom. Unto Thy hands I commend my soul and my prayer: give what Thou seest fit, and fit us for what Thou givest.

Give us wisdom to abound, or patience to suffer need; and where the Master placed us, there to be content. Let us not be over-anxious for to-morrow, to whom strength is hardly for the care of to-day. Yet if Thou wilt, O Lord, grant us a happy life, in things holy, reverend and pure, in things honest, seemly, and fair, in health and cheerfulness and good name, in safety, friendship and peace. Let all our work be done well before we come to die, and let us be gathered into Thine arms as the harvester gathers a shock in full season. Let our death be happy, and our happiness beyond the power of death.

I believe in the living God, the Father who loves, the Almighty who saves, the Creator who forecasts the world; who in mankind makes Himself known by His Word, binding men by His breath into one, and giving us sonship as sons, though we owe to Him as Lord the faithfulness of servants; who ever cares for His own chosen, and out of suffering brings victory; who in our obedience takes away the curse of threatening law, and by our faith robs death of its bitterness. His light enlightens the tomb, and His truth lives for ever.

May we partake of His life, and rise out of sorrow; rise out of despair and fretfulness; rise in prayer and trustfulness; rise in spiritual power and life. May He in compassionate judgment render unto each man according to the works of a man. May He breathe on us holier power, and unite us to Himself and to our brethren of every name, colour, and opinion, with sympathy in all sanctity and right, with faith of sins forgiven, a lively hope of rising out of every evil, and of eternal life before God.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I SPOKE to you last week about the lesson of Good Friday, the meaning of self-sacrifice and faithfulness unto death. On Good Friday we remember the death of Jesus on the Cross, but we remember much more than that, for when a true man suffers faithfully a new trust and a new thankfulness to God fill our hearts, and we cannot feel that he is dead. Through the valley of the shadow he has passed to the more perfect, heavenly life.

And it is this trust and this thankfulness which make Easter Sunday a festival of so much rejoicing in all Christian Churches—it is the festival of new hope, of triumph over death, of joy in the heavenly life; and it is beautiful that this festival comes in the spring-time, when, after what seems the cold, dead time of winter, the earth is awakening again to new life, and we see new beauty and gladness on every side.

What I want you specially to understand is that Good Friday and Easter Sunday in their deeper lessons to our life must go together. They concern not Jesus only, and what we are to think of him, but all true and faithful men and women, who are not afraid to suffer for the right and for their love of others; and the lessons of those two days concern every one of us, teaching us how we also ought to live, and how, when our time is come, we ought to die.

When we understand the meaning of brave and patient suffering and faithfulness even unto death, we know that death is not the end.

You know yourselves what it is to do the right, to speak the truth, even if it costs you something, to be patient and persevering in disagreeable duties, to give up something for those you love. You know that when you have been brave and true in any such way, you are glad, and sometimes it is a great joy that fills your heart, and there seems to be a strength for goodness in your life greater than you have known before. And it is not only seems, for it is very real; it is the strength of God, which makes you strong and glad, because you have chosen what is right and good. So it is that you begin to know what is meant by the "unseen things which are eternal." The faithfulness, the strength, and the gladness are not things that can be seen. You can see signs of them in a friend's face, and you can feel them in your own heart, but they are things of the spirit; hidden from sight, but making us what we really are. And it is just these things, belonging to the real, unseen life of the spirit, which death cannot touch or destroy.

Just as you feel strong and glad when you do what you know to be right, and home is happier, and the world more beautiful to you on that account, so a yet greater strength and gladness come into the world through the faithfulness of those who are not afraid to suffer and even to die for truth and right. The heroic sufferings of the martyrs tell us with a yet greater clearness of those unseen things of the spirit, which are stronger than death. They make us rejoice and feel that it is noble to be alive and to be steadfast like them; and strange as it may seem, they make us feel more deeply how beautiful life is, and how surely they must have passed, through the shadows of death, to life yet more beautiful than this.

Jesus taught his disciples the meaning of righteousness and of unselfish love. He spoke to them, and he speaks to us, if we will hear, of the kingdom of God, of the love and care of our heavenly Father; he bids us all be sure that we have our own place in the household of God, and that we are to live here on earth faithful lives as children of God.

Then came the cruel death on the Cross, to cut short his life. But who that understands his teaching about the unseen things of the spirit and about the Father's care for His children, can think that he is really dead? You know the hymn:

In the Cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time,
All the light of sacred story
Gathers round its head sublime!

We speak of the shadows of death, but in the midst of those shadows the Cross, which tells us of the faithfulness of Jesus, shines with a glorious light, and we thank God for his victory over death.

Our faith in that victory, and in the continuing life of all the children of God, does not depend on whether the friends of Jesus saw him again after his death on the cross, and heard his voice, as of one come back from the grave, as we read in the Gospels. Jesus has taught us to trust in the unseen things of the spirit, and in the unfailing care of our Father in heaven; and whatever we may think of those wonderful stories in the Gospels, and other wonderful stories of people hearing the voices and being made to feel the presence of friends who have died, we must have the strength of our religion, and our joy in the thought of heavenly life resting on another foundation—even the foundation of our present life with God, our Father.

We rejoice in the festival of Easter, because of the faithfulness and the love which are stronger than death, because it is our Father who makes our life so rich and beautiful; and when those whom we love are taken from our sight, we still think of them as in "our Father's House," strong in the same strength, rejoicing in the same love, by which our life here is held secure. And if we long to be nearer to those who have gone before us to the heavenly life, the way is to be more faithful and more unselfish, to make our present life with God more like heaven. By being nearer to God we have the happiness of knowing that we are nearer also to them, who, though hidden from our sight are yet in the same, household, resting in the same love and care.

WHENE'ER a noble deed is wrought,
Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts in glad surprise
To higher levels rise.

The tidal wave of deeper souls
Into our inmost being rolls,
And lifts us unawares
Out of all meaner cares.

Honour to those whose words or deeds
Thus help us in our daily needs,
And by their overflow
Raise us from what is low!

REJOICE EVERMORE.

In the Easter festival one finds the completest reason for such joy. Its message is of life that is good and beautiful, with a fulness of joy marred by no bitter after-thought that soon all will be over, and that in the years as they hasten on we must snatch our joys before the darkness overwhelms us and we pass into the silence and cease to be. Easter is the festival of life, because it lifts up our hearts in the strength of God and of a true spiritual manhood. CHRIST we commemorate as the Chief of faithful souls, as still the inspiration of his brethren. In the light of his faith and love, in the strength of the Eternal, the shadows of death are driven away; in companionship with him, measuring our manhood by the ideal which he has made us understand, we know in whom we trust, and the end of these mortal years sets no bound to our hope or our aspiration, our vision of the spiritual life in love that never fails, our joy in the great fellowship of the children of God.

Trusting in the living God, in our hidden life being with Him, all things appear in a new light, and there is no sorrow that is without hope.

With Easter comes to us also the spring time and the joy of re-awakening earth. In this by itself there might well be a root of bitterness, for the season is quickly past, and even the long chain of golden days and seasons for each one will soon have hastened to an end. Why was the earth made so beautiful, we might then be inclined to ask—why were our hearts made capable of such infinite delight, if it was only that we should be mocked by the inevitable fate of our mortality?

But with the added joy of faith, which belongs especially to this Easter time, it is different. In the strength of God and a spiritual manhood we are brought to the Fountain of all beauty, and know it to be inexhaustible. The lovely season may quickly vanish, even the mountains may be removed from their place, and be no longer crowned for us with the glory of the sun; we may be taken from all the familiar places of our delight—and yet, we are not afraid. For we know this beauty, that it is of God. It is to us a token of His delight, and His goodwill to us. We enjoy it in the strength of our faith, in the confidence of our fellowship with Him, who is the Source of all, and will not leave us without such witness of Himself. Wherever we may be, we have this trust that He will make our habitation beautiful, as the glorious temple of His praise, and the home of happy and contented hearts.

The old vision of heaven bore the lineaments of a city set in gold and precious stones, but for us the natural glories of heaven and earth, in the mountains and the ocean, in the woodlands, the meadows and the still waters, in the homesteads of a peaceful country, furnish an ampler promise of the joy which is Divine, in the loss of which we do not think our FATHER will ever leave us desolate.

As thus faith preserves for us the treasures of the beautiful and our joy in them, so neither can we lose the companionship of noble men and the communion of our own closest friends. The joy of the Easter morning is a universal truth of God, if only with JESUS all men would learn the full meaning of their manhood. God is the Fountain of all beauty, but more intimately to us the FATHER of living souls. The shadow falls, and those who are most dear to us are taken from our sight. But then in the silence, with wonderful revealing and strong consolation, comes the witness of the Spirit, "Not dead, but living unto Him." We do not ask for signs and wonders, we learn only to be still and know that He is God. We say, "Our FATHER"—and we know the meaning of this life of spiritual manhood, which death cannot touch.

Thus the joy of the beautiful world and the delight of visible companionship and mutual service are blended with a deeper blessedness. A life rich in heavenly treasures is set steadfastly towards the light, to work bravely and patiently while here it is day, unwearied in well-doing, in offices of brotherly love, but with a strong confidence in the open future beyond all the shadows of death, pressing on toward a new joy, a more perfect love of those who seem already perfectly loved, in the completed fellowship of the household of God.

The real shadows of life remain, the bitterness of failure and sin, of unworthiness and cowardice, but from all these our refuge is in the FATHER's infinite compassion. It is life to which

He has called us, and not death, and in life with Him there must at last be victory over sin. And in Him also those darker riddles of human fate in this world, which are so terrible to sensitive hearts, must be solved. There is no way of deliverance but in utter surrender to Him who is Eternal Goodness, in undaunted courage that is given in faithful service, and in the patience of hope. And, meanwhile, we are not deprived of the joy, which is of heaven—the joy which each awakening spring-time brings, and that deeper joy of the hidden life, of which Easter is the emblem and the beautiful recurring festival.

TRAMITE RECTA.

He heard a voice above the noisy strife,
Above the rude harsh clamour of the crowd;
He saw a form—a grand, majestic form—
With suffering bowed.

As by a lance's thrust the side was pierced,
A twisted crown was on the kingly head—
A crown of thorns—and, in sweet, tender tones,

"Follow," it said.

"Where shall I follow thee?" he made reply.
It answered: "Steep and difficult the road!
Take it, and walk therein, for it doth lead Straight up to God."

"And that thou may'st more surely know the path,
For it is strait, and other roads there be,
Unworn by touch of all-effacing time
My footprints see."

Then knelt he by the cross-way, and he saw
Those very footprints, red as though with blood:
A track of crimson up the steep grey path
That rose to God.

And thus he spake: "O help me, thorn-crowned King
In weal and woe to follow only thee,
On sun-kissed slopes of Olivet, or in Gethsemane.

"In Nazareth's workshop, willingly obscure,
Or hissed or courted by the fickle crowd;
Through good and bad repute, when men speak fair
Or murmur loud.

"When they cry 'Hail!' and strew the palms before,
And when they scoff, and 'Crucify him!' cry;
Through thronged Jerusalem's draped gaudy streets To Calvary."

Newport, I.W. C. E. PIKE.

We get no good by being ungenerous, even to a book, and calculating profits,—so much help by so much reading. It is rather when we gloriously forget ourselves and plunge soul-forward, headlong, into a book's profound, impassioned for its beauty and salt of truth,—'tis then we get the right good from a book.—E. B. Browning.

NOT SEEING, AND YET BELIEVING.

FROM AN EASTER SERMON BY THE LATE DR. SADLER.

"BLESSED are they who have not seen, and yet believe." But, my friends, the grounds of belief are more and deeper than anything I can put into the shape of argument. What I hope to do, and all I can presume to do, is to give some direction to your thoughts, and still more to your feelings on this Easter morning.

And, first, a future life is closely connected with our moral feelings. We have an instinctive dread of going out of this world with stained hands and an accusing conscience. When the end draws near, I think there are very few who do not sincerely wish they had lived a pure and good life, and who would not rejoice to be able to make amends for the wrong they have done, and who would not, if they could, undo much that they have done, and do much that they have left undone. Then those who have been at enmity would fain be re-united and forgiven. Then the desire is stronger than at any other time to be at peace with one another, with our own hearts, and with God. Then, who is there of us who would not heartily join in Petrarch's prayer:—

O Thou who seest how oft my spirit strays,
Invisible, immortal King of kings!
Restore my soul which still to error clings,
And o'er its sad defects extend Thy grace:
That I, if I have lived in conflicts drear,
May die at last in peace; and if was vain
My stay, my parting may be free from fear.

There are some who, if there be in them no other sign of a belief in a hereafter, have yet this, that they fear it; they cannot throw off their sense of a responsibility for which there must be a reckoning more just, more complete than there has been yet in any earthly retribution. To some extent they may have been answerable for their conduct; but they have not rendered up their account to Him, who gave them their being, and will bring every work into judgment, and every secret thing whether it be good or evil.

Not in this world have we done with life as a trust, committed to us by the God of righteousness. Nor have we reached a point at which there is no more to be attained. There is in our nature a capacity of virtue, of holiness, the measure of which is not filled up here. Even if we make the best use of our three score years and ten, we still fall immeasurably short of the full stature of the perfect man.

Again there is our feeling in regard to the dead. They do not cease to be in our minds or our hearts, when they pass out of our sight. They do not lose their influence over us. Their wishes do not become nothing to us, because they are not with us to express them; but in many instances are more sacred to us than ever before. We can say what we think respecting a future life; but who can put into words the feeling we have towards the dead whom we love? Yet, through this feeling, they are by no means dead to us; they live in our affections; the thought of what they would approve or disapprove is a motive in our conduct; and if we believe that our love for them is given to us by God, what surer pledge could we have of His love for them, and that we may safely commit their spirits into His hands?

There is another feeling we have—namely, that in the great and good, there is something too precious to die; and this feeling is strengthened by the contemplation of men who have nobly sacrificed their earthly lives in order to be faithful to justice, truth, and love.

With such a belief in God as that of the New Testament there is no room for doubt of a future life. When we can think it as a natural thing for earthly parents to be careless of the lives of their children, we may think of our heavenly Father as suffering His children to perish. If God were to us merely the Power supremely controlling all things, or the original principle of life from which all life is derived, we might believe in Him without feeling that we were individually any more the objects of His care than the things around us that rise and pass away. Hence there are some who believe in Him without believing in a future state. But the moment we feel that there is a personal relation between Him and the human soul, we have in Him an everlasting Friend. And this feeling was characteristic of those who had learnt of Christ. It was enough for them to commend their spirits into their Father's hands. Through the love shed abroad in their hearts, they felt that God dwelt in them and they in God: they felt themselves to be partakers of eternal life, because they were partakers of the Divine nature. Hence what is said in the New Testament respecting a future life is rather in the form of testimony than of argument. And the inward witness to which the great Teacher appealed was quickened by what they had to say from their clearer vision and from their higher point of view. What they told from the heights to which they had attained was felt to be as credible as what the mountaineer tells us of the prospect which discloses itself at the heights to which he has climbed.

"Blessed are those who have not seen, and yet have believed." The fact of their belief is more than their reasons for believing. It shows that they have grounds for believing, which to themselves at least are satisfactory, whether or not they can explain them. They are calm and peaceful, when the great change draws near, and talk to us of meeting again. And when they are gone we are reminded of those words of old: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country." The feeling we have in regard to those who are too good to die, our grief and sense of desolation in losing them, our sweet and sad remembrance of them, are to us as the coming on of night, in which the stars of heaven shine down upon us. Truth, goodness, love, piety, are from God, and go to God; they are divine in their nature and cannot be subject to time and decay. "The memorial of virtue is immortal, because it is known with God, and with men. When it is present men take example of it; and when it is gone they desire it: it weareth a crown and triumpheth for ever, having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards." Its assurance for the future is in an eternal life already begun.

In the recently-published Memoir of Emerson, there is a letter in which, to one who had taught him in his childhood, and on whom were creeping the infirmities of age, he expresses with delicate sympathy his own feeling of the gradual and almost imperceptible way in which the larger scale of our being reveals itself to us. He says: "Life wears on, and ministers to you, no doubt, as to me, its underlying and grand lessons, its uncontainable endless poetry, its short, dry prose of scepticism—like veins of cold air in the evening woods, quickly swallowed by the wide warmth of June—its steady correction of the rashness and shortsight of youthful judgments, and its pure repairs of the rents and seeming ruin it operates in what it gave; although we love the first gift so well that we cling long to the ruin, and think we will be cold to the new, if new shall come. But the new steals on us like a star, which rises behind our back as we walk, and we are borrowing gladly its light before we know the benefactor. So be it with you, with me, and with all." Yes, so be it. So though our outward man perish, may the inward man be renewed day by day, till out of the fading vision of things seen and temporal, there arise the clear and brighter vision of those things which are unseen and eternal.

My friends, we owe to the senses a great deal—how much we can only imperfectly realise, while we have still our full use of them. What a pleasant thing it is to behold the light of the sun! What sources of enjoyment, and more than enjoyment, are opened to us in the grandeur and beauty which are seen by us through the bodily eyes! What constant use we make of sight in the pursuits of life! How hard it seems to us to be shut out from the benefits of which that one sense is the instrument! How great, too, is our loss when the daughters of music are brought low and Nature is to us "soundless with all its strains," and the voices of our friends are, as it were, muffled into indistinctness, and the conversation at the table, and at the fireside, is to us only an inarticulate murmur! But the light which broods over the solitudes of the grave is not that "of setting suns, and the round ocean, and the living air," and the voice with which the dead speak to us is not that which is heard by us with the outward ear. There is a spirit in man which giveth him understanding. Without it, what is conveyed to us by the ear and the eye would be without its highest meaning and its purest joy. Through this spirit in man we have the life which is hidden with Christ in God. It is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. Blessed are they who, having not seen, yet believe what God hath revealed to us by His spirit. Let us ask of the bodily eyes what they can show us of the material creation, and of the ears what it belongs to them to tell us; but for tidings of a future state, let us ask of the divine and immortal part in us—of conscience calling upon us to be just and true, though the outward man should perish—of that inward witness which witnesses with our spirits that we are "children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ."

ONE of the illusions is that the present hour is not the critical, decisive hour. Write it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year.—Emerson.

IN MEMORIAM DILECTISSIMAM

MANNING PRENTICE.

Passed, Nov. 20, 1898, aged 52.

So early is this message of farewells,
In lives which all men fain would keep and stay!

So harsh upon the sound of marriage bells

Comes the deep, solemn note which calls away!

So fervid in the race, so near the goal,

While other runners stay the length'n-
ing course,

The flesh too soon betrays the eager soul,
The keen blade rends its mortal sheath perforce!

But far away, down yet to distant years,
The hearts which knew will mourn the great heart gone,

And the white armour, stripped in pain and tears,

For the last triumph shall be girded
on. HENRY CECIL.

KIRKCALDY CHURCH OPENING.

On Saturday the proceedings connected with the opening of the new Unitarian Church at Kirkcaldy, Fife, were begun with a service, at which Principal DRUMMOND, of Manchester College, Oxford, gave an address. The building, which is situated in Hunter-street, in the central part of the town, is a modest but substantial and comfortable hall, capable of seating from 150 to 200 persons. The site, including a large piece of ground to the rear of the present building, cost £305; the building cost £780. The total outlay, including fittings, &c., reached about £1,100. Towards this sum the McQuaker Trustees have, under the terms of the Trust, advanced £500, and it is understood that this will be a first charge on the premises, should the congregation cease. From the proceedings at the opening there is every prospect of a long and useful career for the church. The architect, Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, F.R.I.B.A., of London, must be congratulated on the success of his design, which affords a maximum of comfort and convenience with great strength and durability. A suite of three small rooms at the rear of the hall adds considerably to the usefulness of the building.

There was a large attendance on Saturday, in spite of very miserable snowy weather. There were present, besides a good company of townsfolk, representatives of the congregations at Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen. The Rev. A. E. PARRY, who, as minister of the church, opened the service, also gave a sketch of the history of the movement leading to the erection of the building. After hymn and prayer the Rev. Principal DRUMMOND addressed the meeting. He said it had been arranged that he, in the deeply-regretted absence of the Rev. W. Binns, who was to have opened the church that day, should say a few words indicating the principles for the promotion of which that building had been erected. Outsiders noticed their negations and little or nothing else. Their denials were more apparent to others than to their own consciousness and thought. Unitarians were separated from others simply because, as honest men, they were unable to pretend to believe what they did not believe. Other denominations laid down certain conditions of belief which, though not always accepted by all the members, were supposed to be accepted; and they (the Unitarians) felt it to be inconsistent to associate themselves with such seeming profession. At the same time, no Church could live on negations; they would have to live on the positive principles that appeal to their hearts and minds. Their central doctrine was the love of God the Father. They wished to hold this belief free from beliefs that seemed to deny that love. Indeed, to him the real negations seemed to come from the other side. It was Unitarians who stood up to defend the absolute justice and love of God. So it was with regard to faith in Christ. To them Christ did not appeal as an absolutely exceptional and miraculous being, who was impossible of comprehension, but rather as a human brother who realised the true divine idea of humanity. God dwelt in man, and man in God, in proportion as man assumed to himself the divine spirit of love. These were the great and positive principles by which they lived. Then they claimed in receiving the truth the absolute right of mental freedom. That, again, might seem a denial to some, but to them it was a positive principle that above all things they should be loyal to the truth. They did not claim that they had yet arrived at the whole truth. The light of science was increasing, and they could but believe that in the highest sphere of all there would also be an increase of knowledge. Then this principle was involved in their claim for freedom. They could not suppose that men whom they knew to be good, devout, self-denying men, ought to be separated by intellectual differences in regard to convictions which they all held equally conscientiously. They could not hold themselves debarred from fellowship with Catholics and Protestants of all denominations, and many who would not name the name of Christ, but who yet enshrined in their hearts the Christian spirit. Therefore they came to the conclusion that the religious life was something deeper, more binding, and more powerful than any profession of dogmatic beliefs. The old dogmas and the old creeds should no longer be allowed to stand in the way, and if these were allowed to disappear, they would find that they belonged to a far larger fellowship than appeared on the surface. They invited all brother Christians to meet with them on the great common ground of spiritual conviction, sure that looking beneath the surface of men's intellectual differences they would find that their common beliefs were far more comprehensive and deeper than those beliefs which divided them and were but as the surface waves on the great ocean of religious convictions that rolled round the world.

Addresses were also given by the Revs. A. Webster (Aberdeen), H. Williamson (Dundee), and R. B. Drummond (Edinburgh).

Substantial offertories were taken on this occasion and at the Sunday services, when the Rev. Frank Walters (Newcastle) preached morning and evening. There were excellent congregations, that in the evening quite filling the church. Mr. Walters' sermons, which were respectively upon the subjects of the "Christianity of Christ," and "Unitarianism, the Religion of Humanity," were received with profound attention, and evidently made a deep impression.

SOIREE.

On Monday evening a tea was arranged, followed by music and short speeches. The building was crowded, and some would-be attendants failed to find room. The chair was taken by Mr. H. B. MELVILLE, who briefly expressed the pleasure of the congregation at the opening of their church, and their thanks to all who had contributed to the success of the movement.

The Rev. A. LAZENBY (Glasgow) then read an interesting paper, giving an account of the origin and meaning of the Unitarian movement in Kirkcaldy.

The Rev. R. B. DRUMMOND, who was accompanied by a large contingent of Edinburgh friends, expressed his hearty sympathy with the congregation at Kirkcaldy, and his hope that all prosperity would attend the new chapter of its history.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD (B. and F.U.A. Executive), as representing the McQuaker Trustees, added his congratulations. The help they had received towards building that church had come from many friends, and it was given the more freely because they had shown such a spirit of self-help. Their work was not done yet. They had now with increased means to cultivate more assiduously the moral and spiritual life, to keep an open door for all earnest souls, to help the whole community, and as far as possible be a fountain of upright and intelligent public opinion. In their progress toward such ends he wished them "God-speed."

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT also spoke on behalf of the McQuaker Trustees.

During the meeting a telegraphic greeting was received from the congregation at Aberdeen. Messages of sympathy and regret at inability to attend had also been received from the Rev. A. C. Henderson (Paisley), Rev. E. T. Russell (Glasgow), and Mrs. Humphry Ward; and Miss Gertrude Martineau sent a few lines of good wishes on behalf of her father, Dr. Martineau.

The entertainment included orchestral pieces very well played, songs by Mrs. Spears, Miss Strachan, Mr. Ingram and Mr. Menzies, and some capital recitations by Mr. Morison, of Edinburgh.

The proceedings were closed by a comprehensive vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. A. E. PARRY, and the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

In spite of very inclement weather with wintery frost and snow, the sixty-fifth annual meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission on Tuesday, March 21, was attended by representatives from the majority of the churches in the district, and a healthy and encouraging tone marked the proceedings. The meeting was held, by kind invitation, in the Upper Brook-street Free Church at seven o'clock, after tea and coffee in the schools at half-past six. The chair was taken by Mr. Councillor W. B. PRITCHARD, J.P., and there were also present the Revs. P. M. Higginson, D. Agate, W. E. George, George Evans, W. R. Shanks, C. Roper, and W. E. Atack, Messrs. Harry Rawson, G. H. Leigh, G. Worthington, R. C. Potter, J. Garnett, E. Steinthal, J.

Barker, J. Chadwick, John Heys, and many others.

Apologies for absence were received from the Misses Gaskell the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. C. T. Poynting, Messrs. E. C. Harding, and R. D. Darbishire.

An earnest appeal was read from Mr. E. C. HARDING, who was unable through illness to attend the meeting. Mr. Harding's letter concluded in these words:—

I want you to send men who are prepared to sacrifice themselves in their work; whether it be ministers—who should give all possible help to our missionaries—or whether it be laymen, who take an active part in the real work of the Mission; in a word, men imbued with the spirit of Christianity, who will be prepared to do as Christ would do, preach the "glad tidings" to the poor and take up these little children in their arms and bless them.

The following extracts from the Committee's Report may be of general interest.

The work is not easy, yet in spite of its difficulties it is always a matter for thanksgiving that good work can be done when any real effort is made to do it, and the Committee particularly request that the Reports of their two missionaries may be read with careful attention.

Their missionaries are constantly endeavouring, by various means, to become more thoroughly acquainted with the people. They come into immediate contact with lost lives and poverty-stricken homes; they see the sights that others only read of, and they are ever seeking some sure way of relieving urgent distress, and some wise way of assisting men to recover their standing, their work, their health, and their self-respect. This kind of work is hard enough, and the atmosphere of it sufficiently depressing in itself, and surely it is not right that men engaged in such work should be left in doubt about the efficient support of it, or have to be continually reminded that little money can be spent on it.

The report went on to refer to the hard work by which the Committee had at last succeeded in arousing throughout the neighbourhood a deeper interest in this missionary work, and to the efforts made since the Conference of last March by means of which the subscription list had been so largely increased. Above all, especial attention was called to the great source of future strength and support in the representation of so many churches, by delegates, on the Mission Committee, the increased number of annual collections, and the supply of new workers to the Mission stations.

The TREASURER, after reporting on the very heavy serious deficit for the past year, made the announcement that he had been promised the sum of £200, conditionally on the Society's having no deficit at all at the end of the next year.

After the CHAIRMAN's most interesting address on the work that is being done by the Wood-street Mission of which he is the secretary, and the Rev. W. E. GEORGE's account of lessons learnt in the London Missions, the report of the Committee was adopted.

The Rev. S. H. STREET and the Rev. J. W. BISHOP then responded to the vote of thanks which was so heartily accorded to them on the motion of Mr. Alderman RAWSON, seconded by the Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON.

Both missionaries gave an account of their year's work and experiences which showed in brief what their reports show in detail, that much more work is being done at both Mission stations than any one man could ever do, and both are continually seeking for more and more earnest workers to go down and help them.

To the old list of officers and committee were added the following new names:—Mrs. Roper, Miss Mellor, Messrs. Hugh Herford, E. Russell, and Egbert Steinthal.

To the great regret of all, the Rev. C. Peach, minister at Upper Brook-street, was too seriously ill to be able to attend; a vote of sympathy with him, together with a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman, and to the Upper Brook-street congregation for their kindness and hospitality, was carried unanimously, and the meeting closed with prayer and benediction.

BRISTOL: LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual sermons in aid of this institution, the second of its kind established in England, were preached on Sunday, March 26, by the Rev. Joseph Wood, Birmingham; in the morning at Oakfield-road Church, and in the evening at Lewin's Mead Meeting; the alternative services being taken by the Rev. J. Warschauer, M.A., of Clifton.

The annual meeting was held at the Mission, Lower Maudlin-street, St. James, on the following evening. There was a very large attendance. Mr. ARTHUR H. WANSEY presided, and amongst those present were the Rev. Joseph Wain (the Mission minister), the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the Rev. Joseph Wood (of Birmingham), Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., Mr. G. W. Fry, Mr. B. M. Elliott, Mr. Furber, Mr. C. Walkins, Mr. Ernest Sibree, M.A., and others.

The Rev. J. WAIN read his tenth annual report, in which he described the various features of his work in the homes of the poor, and the many meetings inside the Mission buildings. The chapel services were well attended, and the Sunday-school was in a most flourishing condition. The girls' and boys' clubs in both the junior and senior departments were doing good work, while the men's club was well attended. The Temperance Society, the Mothers' Sewing Class, the Dramatic Society, the Cricket Club, and the Men's Discussion Class still maintained their interest for the people of St. James, while thousands of visits were recorded by the ladies working the Penny Bank. Labour among the poor had its difficulties, but it was full of hope. The poor as a class could be trusted more than they usually gave them credit for, and they were not so bad as they thought. A strong appeal was made for a continuance of help along the broad lines of social and religious work. The Mission was perfectly unsectarian. In their earnest labour they asked their friends to join them with their generous sympathy. Their system showed that they were dealing with units and not with Humanity with a capital H.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD presented the Committee's report, which stated that the past twelve months had been a time of change. Faithful friends, who were devoted to the cause of their Mission, were no longer with them, and their company of active workers was the poorer through their withdrawal. The report then referred in sympathetic terms to the deaths of Mr. T. F. Osborne, the Rev. T. Hincks, and the Rev. J. F. Smith. To the Rev. J. Warschauer and Mrs. Warschauer the Committee offered a cordial welcome. It had been a matter of unaffected regret to the Committee that the treasurer, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, had been called to pass through a prolonged period of serious ill-health, and they congratulated him on his restoration. To their excellent friend and missionary minister, the Rev. Joseph Wain, the Committee tendered once more their warm regard and the promise of their faithful support in the midst of work that proceeded with unqualified success. Contenting themselves with alluding to what the treasurer regarded as on the whole a satisfactory financial statement, the Committee referred their friends for a more detailed account of the various agencies of the Mission to Mr. Wain's own report of last year's experiences.

Mr. BLATCHFORD also read the treasurer's report, in the absence through illness, of the treasurer, Mr. J. K. Champion. The report showed a balance in hand of £22, an increase on the year of nearly £3.

Mr. WORSLEY proposed the adoption of the various reports, and said that the report which Mr. Wain had read came to them, he was sure, with satisfaction.

The Rev. J. WARSCHAUER seconded the resolution, and said that in the treasurer's report and in Mr. Wain's report they saw a veritable application, a veritable realisation of the parable of the loaves and the fishes—the amount of money on the one side, and the amount of good work done on the other side. Mr. Wain's report was a report which they might very well be proud of.

The resolution was carried unanimously. On the motion of Mr. SIBREE, seconded by Mr. FURBER, a vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Wood for his services on Sunday.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD responded, and said he was glad to come to Bristol to see the famous Lewin's Mead Chapel. The work of that Mission was attended by many difficulties, trials, and disappointments. But it was not all trials and disappointments—there was the joy of self-sacrificing labours. He was sure that Mission could not have succeeded so much without ardent, loving, and self-sacrificing missionaries, and in Mr. Wain he was sure they had the man. The Mission would not continue its success, however, unless they kept alive their enthusiasm for it. They had in their missionary a man who gave his life for the work, and who had a love for the work, for his Master, and for his distressed brothers and sisters.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD proposed a resolution congratulating Mr. Wain upon the work he was doing, and promising him their support for the year to come. He never knew a more hopeful man than Mr. Wain. There was no such word as fail in Mr. Wain's lexicon.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. ELLIOTT, and the Rev. J. WAIN responding, thanked them for their encouragement and sympathy, on which he knew he could depend.

The officers for the ensuing year having been appointed, Mr. WORSLEY moved, the Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD seconded, and it was resolved—"That this meeting expresses its warm appreciation of the devotion to the interests of the Mission, so constantly evinced by their esteemed friend, the treasurer, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion; that it offers to him its sincere sympathy in view of his recent severe illness, and most heartily congratulates him upon the prospect of his restoration to health and usefulness."

The proceedings closed with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman.

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.

THE other morning I found myself emerging from my house at the unearthly hour of 4.20 A.M. The weather was by no means enticing; but it is well for all of us to know at first hand something of the conditions under which so many of our brethren have to work in the winter months. Light clouds were drifting across the starlit sky, and discharging themselves in sharp showers upon the earth. There were no traces of the dawn until nearly two hours later. Quiet was the night in the suburb where I live. You may be sure it was something unusual that dragged me out of bed so early, and induced me to face such miserable weather. The world seemed dead. No footfall could be heard save my own; no human form could be seen. The houses were all in darkness, and the god of slumber reigned supreme. At any rate this was the case until I left the residential suburb behind me, and entered the more populous streets, where a working-class population was recuperating for the labours of another day. Here I saw evidences of the ceaseless activity which is essential for the comfort and sanitary well-being of a community. Here and there I came across a night watchman stirring up his glowing fire of coke, or looking round to see that his employers' material was safe. It was nearly five o'clock when I approached my destination; and then from several small streets I saw men emerging with long bamboo poles in their hands, and I concluded that they were a class of "professionals" called "knockers-up"—men who go round waking their clients at stated times by tapping loudly and persistently at their bedroom windows.

Now, I wanted to find a coffee tavern called "Ye Cosie Nooke." I knew the street in which it was situated, and that was all. I was told it opened at five o'clock. Would the attendant be punctual, or should I have to pace up and down waiting for the tavern to open? Immediately I entered the street I observed a very bright light in a corner window; indeed, it was the only lighted house I could see, and so I steered for it. In the windows were cards indicating that I could have a plate of ham for 4d., meat pies 2d. each, hot dish between 12 and 2, coffee $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per cup, and so on. I concluded that this must be the place I was seeking.

As I opened the door, a bell rang announcing to the attendant that a customer had arrived. The attendant was a bright, smart, and cheerful young woman, who must have been stirring about a good while previously, for there was a roaring fire in the grate, and steaming coffee on the counter, with pies and pastry most temptingly displayed, and everything was as clean and natty as a new pin. Round the walls were upholstered seats, and little circular tables stood in front of them. The new paper on the walls and new linoleum on the floor, made the place look extremely inviting. Lying about were the previous day's newspapers. I was almost the first arrival that morning; but I had not to wait long before others dropped in. The attendant struck me as being splendidly adapted for her work. She has a good-natured face, a gift of humour, does not continue her conversation with the customers beyond a decorous limit, and goes about her business as if she meant it. Through a door at the back of this bar-room, you pass into the smoke-room, where games of chess and dominoes are provided, and which is much appreciated at night time.

Ordering a cup of coffee, I lit my pipe, sat myself down in a very comfortable corner by the fire, and with one eye on an Evening News of the previous day I kept the other eye on the new arrivals. No one can sit there from 5 to 6.30 in the morning without feeling that such an institution is a Godsend to the people who use it. One youth came in with a basket containing his day's food. He called for a half-penny cup of coffee, brought forth some bread and butter from his store, and sat in the light and warmth ten minutes or so, before starting on a three miles' walk to Gorton where he worked, and where he had to arrive punctually at 6 o'clock, or be locked out. Next there came in a man who had been employed all night at the gas works, stoking the fires. He was going home to bed, and a cup of something warm was welcome after his laborious toil, and helped him to get to sleep. Then a policeman on his beat dropped in for a large cup of coffee and a meat-pie to boot. I had a most interesting talk with him about catching criminals and the state of crime in general. Speaking from a fairly long experience, he said there was a remarkable decrease in the number of cases of drunkenness; that in his early days as a policeman, every cell in the neighbourhood was pretty sure to be full every night; but that now, notwithstanding the increased consumption of alcohol, they much less frequently had to drag or carry a sot to the lock-up.

"Tis education," said he, "what's doing it. Why, even when a man is drunk he ain't so beastly and obstreperous as he used to be afore he'd had any schooling." He also was of opinion that felony from the person was on the increase, and that such criminals, together with wife-beaters, ought to be punished with the lash—and with this I cordially agreed. Another man was the driver of a despatch cart for one of our evening papers, and from what he told me his poor horse had to put up with, I concluded that there is still a great deal of cruelty to animals which is left unpunished. "You can see the poor brute is leg-tired when it starts in the morning, and at night 'tis just about knocked-up. The only rest it gets is a half-day a month." Two lads who bottled aerated waters at Jewsbury and Brown's, had a bite and a sup before walking over to Ardwick Green, and, as well as they could with their mouths full, they told me how they had to wear gloves and masks at their work on account of the bottles being frequently unable to withstand the pressure of gas, and consequently bursting "all over the show." Another young man, with his tools sticking out of his coat pocket, while refreshing himself, explained to me the mystery of shoeing horses; how their hoofs had to be trimmed; the respective merits of home-made and bought shoes, and the class of horse he catered for in that district. A jobbing bricklayer, who could turn his hand to anything, from slating to sewerage, unburdened his mind as to the character of house property roundabout, and the effects of the late winds; while another man in the building line gave me his opinion concerning the plasterers' strike: "The men'll win," said he, "'cause they're combined, and the masters aren't. The masters think the men's funds'll run out in a month; but, you see, there's so many on 'em working, at they can maintain them what are out."

However, I will not attempt to enumerate all the specimens of humanity, male and female, that came into "Ye Cosie Nooke" on the morning of my visit, but if such provision had not been made for them they would have had to light a fire before leaving home or have gone to work without the comfort of a drink of something warm. Between twenty and thirty people, amongst whom was one girl, came in for coffee before 6.30 A.M. the morning I was there; but they have had as many as thirty-five customers before 7.0 A.M. I have since been all over the house by daylight and I never was in any coffee tavern or club house of this character which was so scrupulously clean, even to the kitchen and scullery where things are sometimes apt to look dirty and disorderly. Upstairs there is a billiard-room in which there is a small-sized table, bought new for the purpose; and adjoining this is what is called the club-room, and it is strictly reserved for members of the club. Members are duly elected, pay threepence a week, and have the use of the billiard-table and other games free; while friends who are introduced are charged a penny a game. The conduct of those who frequent the tavern and club is all that could be desired.

And now for a little past history. Some time ago the Rev. S. H. Street and other workers at the Renshaw-street Mission were much concerned by the fact that several of their young men succumbed to the attractions of the public-houses hard by, and though not habitual drunkards or otherwise very vicious in character, still they deprived their homes of too large a proportion of their wages. It was too much to hope to convert these straight-way into home-birds—they must have some healthier counter-attraction than the public-house. So the idea of a coffee tavern was elaborated and decided upon. Friends were found to meet the initial expenses, and also to provide a guarantee fund of £38. It was sometime before the right sort of house could be secured. Fortunately the landlord is taking quite an interest in the venture, and is papering and painting the house throughout. £50 has been spent upon furnishing; and, besides, a number of useful articles have been given. The furniture is not sumptuous, but it is adequate, and as the venture develops it can easily be added to. The tavern was opened on Jan. 9, and its success is largely due to the indefatigable interest taken in it by Miss Mellor, who is connected with our Long-sight Free Christian Church. For a month she was on the premises night and day; staying there, and preparing coffee, &c., at 4.30 A.M., in order to give the scheme a fair start, and to really see whether it would be appreciated if proper attention were given it. Now there is a paid attendant who lives in the house, and who has a girl to help her during the day. Besides, a number of ladies are found quite willing to take their turns at the counter in the afternoons, while the attendant has a period of rest. From twelve to two each day, Miss Mellor is there to serve what is called a Hot Plate—sometimes soup and sometimes “hot-pot.” The first week the takings were £3 17s. 1½d.; last week, £3 11s. 5d. They have varied from just under £3 up to £4, exclusive of the membership fees; and there are now thirty members. About £1 is taken on a Saturday. It is estimated that nearly 40 per cent. of the takings is profit. The rent is £22 10s. 0d.; and what with rates and taxes and servants’ wages the total weekly expense is about £1 10s. 0d. Thus far, the undertaking has quite paid its way. A piano is badly needed; and it may happen that this will meet the eye of someone who has an instrument which he could easily and gladly give for the furtherance of this good work. A few evenings after my visit there was to be held the first smoking concert, when the door separating the two lower rooms was to be taken off its hinges, and a piano was to be hired for the occasion. No doubt a very merry evening was spent. Thus far the Coffee Tavern and Club have been a success, proving the attraction which the promoters expected, and supplying a distinctly felt want in that neighbourhood. Mr. Street has ideas of further and interesting development, but the time for launching them has not yet come. The initial venture must be firmly established first.—CHARLES ROPER.

THE scheme for raising the sum of £10,000 or more to commemorate the jubilee of the London District Society, and to put the London churches in a better position for doing their work in the coming century, has already received the hearty approval of all the Metropolitan churches. The various congregations are co-operating in this movement, and are determined to make it a great success. The funds, when raised, will be devoted to the following purposes:—

1. A portion of the fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, will be devoted to paying off the debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of some of the chapels in or near London; the particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, to be settled by the Committee, due regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

2. The remainder of the fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel Building Fund, for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with open Trusts. This fund will be vested in a body of twelve trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by those who subscribe the money. The trustees shall have a voice in the selection of sites, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the purchase and erection of a building.

3. The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and in such amounts as the trustees shall determine. The income of such portion of the fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, will be paid each year to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, for the general purposes of that society.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—A reunion of the members of the Christian Unitarian Church and their friends was held on Monday evening in the Trades’ Hall, over 400 being present. Mr. David Grant presided, and was supported by the Rev. Alexander Webster, the Rev. A. Doak, M.A., of the Free Church, Dr. Mitchell, Mr. John Keir, member of the School Board, and others. The Chairman referred to the great congregations which had gathered to the Sunday services held by Mr. Webster in that hall, and to the necessity for the reconstruction of their present church building. There were other financial liabilities, but he was not afraid, when he thought of the number of those who gathered to their services. Subsequent speakers referred to the great value of Mr. Webster’s services as Chairman of the School Board and in other ways in the town. Mr. Webster also spoke, and telegrams of congratulation were exchanged with the meeting celebrating the opening of the new church at Kirkcaldy at the same time.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The second anniversary services of the Unitarian congregation were held in the Mechanics’ Institute last Sunday afternoon and evening. The devotional parts were taken by the resident minister, and the sermons were preached by the Rev. Joseph Freeston, formerly minister of the neighbouring congregation of Stalybridge. The name of the preacher is affectionately remembered in this district, and many of his old friends took the opportunity of seeing and hearing him once more. The attendances were—afternoon, 220; evening, 300. Collections at the services realised £16. In the evening the minister announced that at the annual business meeting next Sunday a scheme for building on the recently-acquired site would be put before the congregation.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—This church has been re-opened after extensive alterations, by which the accommodation has been doubled, and a side entrance added. Three memorial windows, adding greatly to the beauty of the church, have been given—two by Captain W. B. Ritchie, and a third by Mrs. T. Hay Ritchie, of London. The windows commemorate the late Dr. and Mrs. Ritchie and Mr. T. Hay Ritchie. An American organ has also been given by Mr. S. C. Davidson. The opening services, which commenced on March 12, have been conducted by the Revs. G. Hamilton Vance, B.D., S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., and Dr. Griffiths. A further service is to be conducted on Sunday next by the Rev. W. Napier.

Bradford.—The new schools in connection with Chapel-lane Chapel, which have been built on the site of the old schools behind the chapel, were formally opened by Miss Brown, of Leeds, on March 23. The schools have been built from the plans of Messrs. Empsall and Clarkson, whose designs were accepted in limited competition. The new building is in three floors. In the basement are a boiler, providing steam for the heating on a new system of both the chapel and the school, and a well-equipped kitchen and larder, which will serve all the requirements of the school upon social occasions. The ground floor is divided into a general schoolroom and three class-rooms, and above these is a large assembly-hall, called the Channing Hall. The assembly-hall is a lofty room, with sitting accommodation for a large number of persons, and a very convenient platform at one end. The building is excellently lighted throughout, and is well supplied with all the necessary services and conveniences. At half-past five in the afternoon the Rev. E. C. Jones presented to Miss Brown a key, with which she formally unlocked the door of the new building. A large company who witnessed the opening ceremony then gathered in the assembly-hall previously referred to, and a short service was held there. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who presided, said he considered it to be one of the greatest privileges of his life to be allowed to say the first words in that beautiful hall, to welcome Miss Brown, and to express his appreciation of the fine building which had been erected for them during the past ten months. Miss Brown said that she had great pleasure in declaring the school to be opened and in naming that hall Channing Hall, in memory of Dr. Channing, whose rich moral and spiritual teaching had been a source of comfort and strength and inspiration to countless multitudes, and whose influence would extend to unborn generations. She congratulated them all upon the possession of that beautiful hall. A dedication prayer was offered by the Rev. E. C. Jones, and with the singing of the Lord’s Prayer the service ended. In the evening, after a large number of the members of the congregation had had tea together, a public meeting was held in Channing Hall, and there was a very crowded attendance. The chair was taken by Mr. C. H. Ellis, who was supported by Miss Brown, Mrs. Boothroyd, Mrs. Empsall, Mrs. Ellis, the Revs. E. C. Jones, A. Chalmers, C. Hargrove, W. H. Eastlake, J. McDowell, A. W. Fox, J. G. Slater, and J. Ellis, and Messrs. B. Boothroyd and J. G. Slater, chapel wardens. The Chairman said it was only two years ago that he had stood in the old school, and urged them to take up the work of building new schools; and already the work was actually accomplished. It had, of course, not been done without great sacrifice, but nothing was of real value unless it involved sacrifice. He spoke in highly appreciative terms of the work of the pastor and Mr. Byron Boothroyd, and the architects and others who had taken a prominent part in the work. Mr. Byron Boothroyd, the treasurer, made a statement which was to the effect that the building fund now stood at £1,440, whilst a total expenditure of about £1,700 had been sanctioned. The project had received very admirable support from the pastor and the congregation and distant friends. Still there was something yet to be done, and it was to be hoped that their friends would do their utmost to help in future efforts. He had every hope that by the end of the year the building would be free from debt. Never in his experience had things been so bright and hopeful at Chapel-lane as they were to-day. In conclusion, he announced that Miss Brown had given a donation of £50, in memory of her father’s long connection with Bradford. Miss Collins moved a vote of thanks to Miss Brown, which was seconded by the Rev. John Ellis, and carried. Miss Brown, in responding, said she hoped the building would do work which would do honour to the name of Unitarian Christianity, and that they would find an even more enduring memorial than the structure in the characters that were being built up within its walls. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones then moved a resolution of cordial welcome to the ministers of the district and other friends who had come to rejoice with them. The Revs. C. Hargrove, A. Chalmers and other of the visitors responded in encouraging speeches. A bazaar is announced for Oct. 19, 20 and 21 to complete the payment for the new schools, and other purposes.

Chelmsford.—On Wednesday evening, March 22, an interesting lecture was given at Unity Chapel by the Rev. E. J. Harry on “A Visit to Italy,” illustrated by lantern views. The chair was taken by Mr. J. H. Wray.

Chichester.—On Monday last the Rev. C. A. Hodinott was re-elected third amongst the successful candidates at the triennial election of the Board of Guardians.

Derby.—The Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., minister of the Friar-gate Chapel, has been again elected a member of the Board of Guardians for King’s Mead Ward, after a contest in which there were ten candidates for the five seats.

Devonport: Christ Church.—Monday last March 27, the half-yearly conference of Devonshire ministers was held at Devonport. Regret was expressed at the pending removal of the Rev. Priestley Prime from the district, and good wishes for him in his new sphere of work. Kind words of welcome were also spoken to the Rev. Wm. Agar, who has recently become minister at Sidmouth; and to the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, on his temporary settlement as minister-in-charge at Devonport. These gentlemen responded. In connection with this conference, the congregation at Devonport organised a public meeting, held in their own beautiful church. There was a gratifying gathering of friends at tea provided in the schoolroom at 5.30, and a much larger assembly at the meeting which followed. The Rev. J. Barron (Tavistock) spoke upon “Unitarianism the Faith of the Early Christian Church.” The Rev. F. Teasdale Read (Moreton Hampstead) addressed the meeting upon “The Deity of Christ”; the Rev. J. S. Mathers, M.A. (Plymouth), on “The Freedom of Unitarianism”; the Rev. Priestley Prime (Torquay), on “The Real Evangelical Faith”; the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, on “Unitarianism and the Problems of Life”; the Rev. T. B. Broadrick (District minister), on “Unitarianism and the Unity of the Spirit.” The speeches were short and pointed—only about ten minutes each—anthems and solos by the choir, and other friends being interspersed.

Downpatrick.—The annual soirée of the First Presbyterian Non-subscribing Congregation was held in the Assembly Hall last week. The chair was taken by the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, minister of the congregation, who, in the course of an earnest address, spoke of the breaking down of the spirit of exclusiveness, and expressed the hope that liberty and toleration would be still further extended among the churches. He was followed by the Rev. W. Napier, who gave some interesting reminiscences of earlier days at Downpatrick, where he had been at school, and of former ministers. The Rev. J. H. Bibby also spoke, and in the course of the evening, Mrs. Dunbar presented prizes of books to the Sunday-school children. Music and social intercourse added to the pleasure of a very successful evening, which concluded with the singing of the "National Anthem."

Edinburgh.—The Weekly Scotsman says:—"A pretty wedding was solemnised in St. Mark's Chapel, Edinburgh, on Wednesday, March 22, when the Rev. Sydney H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., Holywood, Belfast, was married to Miss Catherine Isabella Drummond, M.A., daughter of the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of St. Mark's. The church was beautifully decorated around the pulpit with palms and white lilies, and the service was choral. The bride's father performed the ceremony, assisted by the Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Litt.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, uncle of the bride. It was a unique wedding, inasmuch as all the parties connected with it—the two ministers, the bride and bridegroom, the bridesmaid and best man—are all University graduates. Miss Margaret Drummond, M.A., sister of the bride, was bridesmaid; the groomsmen were Dr. W. B. Drummond. The bridal gifts were very numerous. In addition to many private gifts from members of St. Mark's congregation (and other friends), the bride received a beautiful presentation silver tea service and a case of fruit knives and forks. The members of St. Mark's Sunday-school gave the bride a silver-mounted oak tray."

Glasgow: St. Vincent-st.—The annual congregational meeting was held last Sunday after the morning service. The Committee presented their report for the year, from which it appeared that the membership of the church had increased from 285 to 307—an evidence, the report says, of the appreciation of Mr. Lazenby's services. The treasurer submitted the balance sheet, showing that the ordinary income and expenditure of the church had been £585 17s. 0½d. This, together with contributions for other purposes, make a total income of £630.

Guildford (Appointment).—Mr. E. S. Lang Buckland, who during the present session is studying as a special student at Manchester College, Oxford, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of the Guildford congregation, and enters on his duties at once.

Hastings.—The Rev. S. Gardner Preston, minister of the Free Christian Church, is giving a course of lectures in a class-room in the Board-school at Clive Vale, a suburb of Hastings. The course deals with such subjects as "What is the Bible," "Does Death fix Fate," "Is Punishment Eternal." The aim of these lectures, which have been well attended, mostly by residents in the neighbourhood, is educational rather than controversial; they are designed to stimulate thought and inquiry on religious subjects. Discussion is invited at the close, and the lectures, a correspondent tells us, are evidently much appreciated. Mr. Preston, who is a ready and fluent speaker, has made himself very well known in the town, being a member of the School Board, and taking a prominent part in public affairs.

Huddersfield.—A very successful bazaar was held in the schoolroom of the Fitzwilliam-street Church on Wednesday, March 22, and the two following days. The object of the bazaar, as we have already stated, was to raise not less than £200 to clear off the church debt and to meet the cost of alterations and necessary repairs. On the opening day Mr. J. Woodhead, J.P., presided, and, in the regretted absence of Lady O'Hagan, the bazaar was opened by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds. There were also present the Revs. W. Mellor (minister of the church), C. Hargrove, J. McDowell, and Iden Payne, Mr. J. S. Mathers, J.P., Councillor Owen Balmforth, and others. The opening ceremony on the second day was performed by Alderman Denham, in the absence of the Mayor, and on the third day by Miss Dixon, of Edgerton. On each occasion encouraging speeches were made, and the proceeds amounted altogether to £230.

Liverpool: Hamilton-road Domestic Mission.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Wednesday last, March 22, the president, Mr. Charles W. Jones, in the chair. The Revs. H. W. Hawkes and J. L. Haigh (minister of the church), Mr. W. Wortley, and Captain Denton, C.C., also addressed the meeting, which was interspersed with songs by the Walton Breck Musical Society. The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, 26th ult. Mr. W. L. Schroeder, B.A., conducted the morning and afternoon services, which were well attended. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, who delivered a most inspiring address to a large congregation.

Liverpool: Mill-street Domestic Mission.—The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones has been elected a member of the Tenth Board of Guardians, being second on the list of seven candidates for three seats.

Liverpool Sunday-school Society.—The annual meeting was held on Thursday, March 23, at the Unitarian Institute, Mr. James Burton, M.A. (vice-president), in the chair. The report of the Council, read by the hon. sec., showed that good and useful work had been done during the year. Comparing the statistics of the schools with those of the previous year, there were only nine more children on the books, but the average afternoon attendance had increased by forty. At the close of the report the Council expressed their sympathy with their President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and their regret at the loss of his assistance and advice during the past winter, earnestly hoping for his speedy restoration to health. The treasurer reported that the financial position of the Society was satisfactory; instead of having a debt of £12 with which they began the year, there was now a small balance in hand. After the business the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., of Bolton, gave a specimen lesson for young children on "Character." The teachers present, who numbered about thirty, much appreciated the very helpful lesson. A vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Anderton, and also to the retiring officers for the year.

London: Brixton.—The last soirée of the present season was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday, the 22nd ult. A most attractive Shakespearean programme was provided by Miss Blake, Miss Burridge, Miss Busher, Miss Crane, Miss Jessie Epps, Miss L. Walmsley Little, Mrs. Mayne, Mrs. Nettlefold, Mrs. Veillard, Messrs. Busher, A. R. Keating, Mayne, Reeves, T. H. Terry and Veillard. The scenes selected were admirably given, and with Shakespearean music and songs rendered by Miss Keating and Messrs. Harrison and Veillard, were greatly enjoyed by a crowded audience.

London: Welsh Services.—The company of friends united in this movement has been strengthened by the settlement in London of Mr. D. J. Davies, B.A., who conducted the service at Essex Hall last Sunday.

Manchester: Longsight.—The bazaar, which had for its object the raising of funds to beautify the Free Christian Church and Schools, and to repair the organ, took place on March 16, 17 and 18, and was also open on the following Monday evening. A sum of £250 was required and towards this £240 was raised. The opening day was most unfavourable as regards weather, a dense fog hanging over Manchester the whole of the day, which no doubt prevented many friends from being present. The effort has, nevertheless, been very successful, and the hearty thanks of the congregation are tendered to all those who have assisted in any way to bring about such a satisfactory result.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday-school Union.—The fifth United Teachers' meeting of the session was held in the Upper Brook-street schoolroom on Sunday, March 19, the president, Mr. H. Woodhead, in the chair. The Rev. C. Roper, B.A., Moss Side, read a paper on "Esprit de Corps of the Sunday-school," which, he said, was not the same thing as discipline, and yet was closely connected with it. A school should be alive, every limb of it strong through continuous use, and all concerned should be actuated by a healthy pride. A discussion followed, in which the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., and Messrs. Higson, Pinley, Woodhead, White and Charlton took part.

Scotland: Springburn.—On Friday evening, March 17, the Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, lectured in the Argyle Hall at Springburn, under the auspices of the McQuaker Trust, his subject being, "Did Jesus believe himself to be God?" On March 24 Mr. Russell gave a further lecture on "False claims for the Bible."

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co. Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London."

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer of the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq. (President of the Provincial Assembly of London and S. E. Counties), Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EASTER came to us for the most part with pleasant weather, and the first beautiful touches of spring. Wild daffodils and primroses come pouring in, and it has been delightful to think of many friends rejoicing in the open country. But the gladness was overshadowed by news of the terrible catastrophe on the Casket rocks, off the Channel Islands. On Thursday afternoon, in a thick fog, the Stella, a passenger steamer from Southampton, ran upon the rocks, and in hardly more than ten minutes, went to pieces. Not less than eighty of the crew and passengers seem to have perished, and those who escaped in the boats suffered much before they were rescued. Yet even this sudden tragedy brings with it something more than horror. With wonderful calmness and resolution everything was done that was possible to save the people. "Lower away the boats; women and children first," was the captain's instant order; and there was no panic. One of the stewardesses, who had put on a life-belt, gave it up to a girl who pleaded for one, and remained to go down with the ship, and many another act of self-sacrifice is recorded. The captain, of course, stood upon the bridge to the last, seeing that everything possible was done. Death takes on a new aspect when it is so nobly faced.

THE April number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains the sermon preached by the Rev. C. Hargrove on Easter Sunday, "Buried or Risen?"—a vindication of the true spiritual rising of Jesus, and of the new birth of faith in the disciples, as undoubted facts, whatever opinion be held of the fate of the crucified body. There is little comfort to be got from belief in the resurrection of the bodies of all mankind. It is the personal, spiritual life which is beyond the power of death. "He is not here," our Lord and Master. "He is risen," and has shown us how to live and die, so that we may rise too. Oh, to follow him upwards, living even here and now of the higher life! life of the man within us, the beast from day to day subdued: and so meeting death as no dying but rising to new life, life of love and knowledge, life of the true man, who is Son of God!

THE Bishop of Winchester is zealous against "lawlessness" in the Church, and by his order the Athanasian Creed was again read on Easter Sunday at St. Thomas's Church, Portsmouth, after an interval of many years. The vicar, the Rev. Canon Grant, afterwards preached an earnest sermon on Immortality, and in vindication of the universal Fatherhood of God. By order of the same authority the creed was also read at St. Jude's Church, Southsea.

IN a further letter to the Liverpool Daily Post, arising out of the recent meeting of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches in Liverpool, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong dealt with two questions raised by the constitution of the Council. First, though without hope of any practical result, he referred to the use of the term 'Evangelical.' "If the word," he said, "has any meaning at all, it should surely apply to those whose religious sentiment mainly rests on the teaching of the 'Evangelium' or Gospel, as distinguished from those who lay more stress on the supposed theology of the Epistles and the Church of the early centuries. We Unitarians accept fully and without qualification the marvellous teaching of Jesus Christ concerning the tender Fatherhood of God and the spiritual communion with the Father, which is open to every one of his children. We believe, with Jesus, that it is this supreme faith which is able above all else to bless and hallow human life. And we are zealous against any teachings which qualify or infringe this faith which Jesus has so wonderfully proclaimed, appealing to the authority of the clear conscience and the pure heart and the experience of life for the confirmation of its truth. Now, our friends of the Federated Churches so far qualify this Gospel teaching as to say that the sacrifice of the Son was necessary before the Father's love could become an effective force in our spiritual lives. Of course they may be right and we wrong. The teaching of Jesus may have been, as they would appear to think, defective and inadequate. But at least we, who with a whole heart accept the faith of Jesus as poured forth in the glory of parable and Sermon on the Mount are the Evangelicals—the Gospel Christians. Our friends would describe themselves more accurately as 'Epistolarians,' founding mainly on St. Paul, or rather the later interpreters of St. Paul. Still, I know very well that we can no more hope for restitution in this matter than the peasant whose grandfather's little plot of ground was grabbed by the big landlord fifty years ago."

THE second question with which Mr. Armstrong dealt he regarded as far more serious, as involving a "broken and degraded ideal," and a sadly retrograde policy, fraught with immeasurable mischief. Of this he wrote as follows :—

"Within the last ten or twenty years the English people have begun to find out as they never found out before, that one spirit animates many forms of faith, and that men of widely variant creed can work together for the promotion of the Kingdom of God on earth, each with perfect faithfulness to his own convictions. And all over England organisations of a purely unsectarian nature have sprung up for the promotion of temperance, social purity, peace education, and so forth. The development of this kind of union during the last twenty years, with the discovery of how much in tune men's hearts may beat, how closely kindred may be their purposes and enthusiasms, though they pronounce different creeds, has probably been the most hopeful and blessed element in the evolution of the English world during that fruitful period. And this might have gone on and grown, to the unspeakable good of mankind, but for the intervention of the Evangelical Federation. It is true that only in comparatively few cases have they directly broken up prior associations for social work, but they have everywhere called on their men and women to unite for social work on doctrinal lines and with ecclesiastical tickets of admission. Their pretext is that they are also combined for the propagation of their theological views. But everyone who looks at the mass of social subjects treated in Liverpool last week must see that this is at least the moiety of the Federation's work. And it is a great and grave, perhaps an irreparable, injury to England that the Federation has done in throwing the whole weight of its influence into the scale for sectarian delimitation in the organisation of social and moral improvements, and against that high and hallowed co-operation for these purposes among people of various creeds which was beginning to spread in so auspicious a manner among our countrymen. It is false, and every member of the Federation knows in his heart that it is false, that only the so-called Evangelical theology can supply the true Christ-motive in the hearts and souls of men."

THE news of the death of Mr. T. E. Ellis, M.P., the Chief Liberal Whip, who died of brain fever at Cannes, where he was staying with Sir John Brunner, has been received with the deepest regret throughout Wales and in this country. Mr. Ellis was the son of a Merioneth tenant farmer, born in 1859, and was at first intended for the ministry of the Calvinistic Methodist Church. After studying at Bala Theological College, he went to Oxford with a scholarship and graduated with honours in classics and modern history. He then devoted himself to a political career. Having become private secretary to Sir John Brunner, in 1886 he entered Parliament as member for Merioneth, and quickly made his power felt as leader of the popular party in Wales. To his own people he rendered distinguished services, especially in the matter of higher education, and in the ranks of Liberals the loss of his services as Whip will be keenly felt.

THE death of Mr. Richard Chamberlain, brother of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, after a successful operation, from which he had not strength to rally, came as a release from distressing sufferings. Born in 1840 in London, Mr. Chamberlain was educated at University College School, and in 1863 entered on a successful business career in Birmingham. In 1874 he entered the Town Council, and subsequently for two years filled the office of Mayor with great distinction. From 1885 to 1892 he represented West Islington in Parliament.

LONDON BAZAAR.—When Unitarians become enthusiastic, we may be sure there is some intelligent motive behind it, and that the result will be something substantial. Although most of our friends do not really like bazaars, yet they are putting on one side their own personal feelings, and throwing themselves earnestly into this effort of the London Churches to raise at least £10,000 by May, 1900. Nearly every church has organised its working party, and manifesting a commendable devotion and zeal in providing articles with which to furnish the various stalls. Outside the Metropolitan area, the churches of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties have graciously come forward to help in this work, and have undertaken to provide a Provincial Assembly stall. Several ladies have already promised to act as centres for the different districts, by whom contributions will be gladly received:—Mrs. Cobb, Lewes; Mrs. G. Chitty, Dover; Mrs. A. Hood, Brighton; Mrs. Felix Taylor, Ten-terden; Mrs. Hallatt, Newbury; Miss E. Kensett, Horsham; Miss Brothers, Canterbury.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE OLD WARRINGTON ACADEMY.

(From a Correspondent.)

MARK where its simple front yon mansion rears,

The nursery of men for future years!
Here callow chiefs and embryo statesmen vie,
And unfledg'd poets short excursions try:
While Mersey's gentle current, which too long
By fame neglected, and unknown to song,
Between his rushy banks (no poet's theme)
Had crept inglorious, like a vulgar stream,
Reflects th' ascending seats with conscious pride,
And dares to emulate a classic tide.

These lines by Mrs. Barbauld refer to the Warrington Academy, and they help to recall to the modern dweller in the busy manufacturing town the days when the waters of the Mersey were stocked with fish, and students and lovers wandered along its rushy banks. All is changed. Even to try to picture the scenes of those far-distant days is too great an effort for the imagination, clogged with smoke and noise. But the mansion with the "simple front" still stands, and has just undergone a beautiful restoration at the hands of a few enthusiastic lovers of the past. For many years it was hidden by a hideous structure of red brick and plate glass, but town improvements have exposed it once more, and it may now be seen, an attractive, old-fashioned house, standing on the Lancashire side of Warrington Bridge, by all who use the great highway between the two counties, for there is no other bridge nearer than Stockport on the one hand, and Runcorn on the other.
